In Kabbalah, Isaac is linked to gevura (strength). This suggests that in addition to being a national symbol, the sand, like the stars, has individual meaning for us. But it is not the strength developed at the health club weight room.

Our rabbis teach: Who is mighty? Who is a hero? The one who conquers desire. Thus, discipline is at issue: holding back the powerful waves that batter us internally, the desires and emotions that threaten to destroy us and many around us. Self-control makes one into a hero.

Isaac turns out to be the quietest of the ancestors, seemingly passive. After the Akedah experience, not much can excite or agitate him. But there is a gap in the Torah text. Nothing is mentioned about Isaac's reaction to this experience. We must use our imagination to understand more about Isaac.

Isaac must have been in a state of great tension. Before the benign conclusion to the story, he was surely anxious and fearful. He did not know until the last moment that he was to be the intended sacrifice. He had cause to feel anger, hurt and betrayal. All this was mixed with some sense of ecstasy and inspiration, for now God's blessing was upon him. Isaac must have been a very confused young man.

We can also imagine that if this had happened today, Isaac would hire a good lawyer and sue his parents for abuse. Or he might just endlessly vent his anger upon society through random violent acts. After all, he was a victim. He had been abused and now had the right to abuse in return. Today nobody seems responsible for their actions. If they plead victimization or blame someone else, they believe they are excused for their violent acts. An allegedly victimized wife can mutilate her husband; allegedly abused children can murder their parents and inherit their millions. Society seems plagued by a bizarre sympathy with real or alleged victims of abuse and their violent reactions. This is one of the most frightening aspects of contemporary life, as the cycle of violence increases and we become more afraid to walk the streets of our cities.

Isaac is the symbol of strength and discipline. He becomes Isaac, our father, because he suffered and was able to maintain control over himself. This is what a midrash suggests when it says that Isaac brought suffering into the world. Surely others had suffered before him. However, he suffered and did not let his human dignity suffer. He did not lash out in angry violence against the world.

This is an important theme in the Torah. Numerous times we are reminded: you were strangers in Egypt; therefore, you know the soul of the stranger. Do not mistreat them. You were slaves in Egypt; therefore, do not enslave anyone else. On the contrary, you should be more sensitive to these situations. When you see suffering, illness and violence try to act in a helpful manner. Do not stand idly by nor walk away. Do not be angry with the world. Elie Wiesel once said that to be a Jew is to have all the reason in the world to hate and destroy and yet not to do so, but rather to affirm life, respect and goodness.

We are all victims of life. We have been abused by illness and infirmity, disappointment and death. To live is to be unavoidably abused. To live is to not be filled with destructive anger. This is not always easy or comfortable or pleasant. But a good life requires discipline and sacrifice. It requires akedah, seeing ourselves on the altar and still choosing life.

Students study the Holocaust

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — In the discussion sessions that concluded the second annual student seminar on the Holocaust, the participants said they had learned a lesson they would not soon forget.

"I've been learning about the Holocaust since Grade 7, but today I think I learned more than in all those years," wrote one student.

Close to 400 grade 11, 12 and OAC students, who packed the auditorium in the Burke Science Building of McMaster University, listened silently to keynote speaker Dr. Leon Bass, as he told of his anger at the racism he experienced as a young black soldier in the American forces during World War II and his shock at the sight that greeted his platoon when they entered Buchenwald.

Many students wept when Bass described what he saw, saying the inmates were "Jews and Gypsies and Catholics, homosexuals, Jehovah's Witnesses and the handicapped ... placed there by the Nazis because none of them were fit to live."

His "blinders came off" and he knew then, he said, that his own suffering was nothing compared to "the face of evil" seen at Buchenwald.

Buchenwald survivor, Romanian-born Maurice Kaufman, thanked Dr. Bass for having liberated him. And Polish survivor Sam Szpirglas made an unscheduled appearance before the microphone to confirm everything Bass had said about Buchenwald. "I know," said Szpirglas, "because I was there."

The seminar was sponsored jointly by the Hamilton Board of Education; the Hamilton-Wentworth Roman Catholic Board of Education; the Wentworth Board of Education; McMaster University, Department of History and United Jewish Appeal/Jewish Federation of Hamilton-Wentworth & Area.

WISDOM OF THE AGES

It's a burden to carry, but a pity to throw away

Canadian Jews have come a long way

By IRVING ABELLA

Being a Jew in Canada today is being able to celebrate and freely participate in all of this country's wonderful possibilities. Canada is today a generous country, far different from the benighted, xenophobic, anti-Semitic country it was a generation or two ago, when Jews were excluded from every sector of Canadian society and were even excluded from the country itself by a government and a people who felt there were already too many Jews.

GUEST VOICES

This is an enormous country with a tiny Jewish population. And as it is for all Canadians, Jewish life is influenced by the vastness of the land. If Jews suffer from an excess of history, then Canadians suffer from an excess of geography — and Canadian Jews suffer from both. We are the world's largest small nation. That sense of smallness and the immensity of the country may well have contributed to a sense of insecurity and marginality that has dominated the Canadian Jewish community for too much of its history in this century.

But thankfully, that feeling of insecurity and marginality is long gone. We are now a confident, articulate community, an example that multiculturalism works. And if it works for us, it can work for others.

Multiculturalism is a wonderful policy. And I say that as a Canadian historian and, of course, as your very immediate past president of Canadian Jewish Congress. It is innovative; it has enhanced our self-image; it has proven a life-saver to many communities; it has created pride where there had once only been pain, comfort where there was once only contempt; and it has given Canadians a sense of uniqueness.

What makes Canada unique is our pluralist culture. The Canadian mosaic is our national cliche; it is our single most important national characteristic ... What makes Canada so special is the unwritten compact that bigotry will not be condoned, that instead of abusing one another we can always talk out our problems and sometimes even our prejudices ...

Together we have built a Canada whose watchwords are decency and civility and whose goals are equity and equality. We have become a model for nations throughout the world, and if we are not, we should be. We are today a nation that celebrates differences, that tries, often clumsily but nevertheless with determination, to accommodate as many diversities as possible.

As a people, we are not afraid to talk openly and incessantly about our failings; indeed, perhaps we spend too much time running ourselves down. But that too is a Canada characteristic. We are, somebody once said, a country full of solutions looking for problems. But that too is a strength rather than a weakness ...

Quite frankly, this is not an easy time to be in the human-rights business. Trying economic times do not encourage generosity of spirit and we are confronting on a worldwide stage increasing intolerance. There is a tribalism abroad which frightens me and ought to frighten you. We Jews who have grown up in the shadow of the Holocaust have extra-sensitive antennae, and mine are now waving frantically.

And, of course, the latest manifestation of intolerance is the frightening backlash against multiculturalism and affirmative-action programs. In the United States and to a lesser extent in Canada, the great equity programs and legislation of the past 25 years are under attack and are being rolled back. There is a mean-spiritedness abroad that is scary because it is so raw and so blatant. The traditional victims — women, visible minorities, immigrants, refugees and, yes, Jews — have become the victimizers according to the new peddlers of intolerance.

And we at Canadian Jewish Congress ought to be in the forefront combating this new and frightening intolerance. We cannot accept the views of some that we ought to be more parochial and self-centred, that we ought not concern ourselves with the problems of others.

Because of our history, we Jews have much to offer others. Is there a people more knowledgeable about being refugees? Have we not wandered the face of the earth for centuries? And what people over the years has been so often, for so long and in so many places oppressed and discriminated against, who knows better than we do how to fight evil, to overcome injustice and to struggle for equality?

As Jews, we have an obligation to set the tone of the debate in this country and to be its conscience. We are only a Jewish community if we behave like one.

Today, we Jews in Canada worry more about rates of assimilation rather than rates of anti-Semitism. Our greatest concern is for our children. Will they remain Jewish? Will our community survive into the next century as strongly as it seems to be leaving this? Are the very seeds of our destruction implanted in our success? Can Jewishness in Canada survive freedom? Can it survive an open, tolerant, multicultural society?

It is our task at Canadian Jewish Congress and as leaders of the Jewish community to change the focus in Jewish society on survival as a substitute for content. Above all else, we must show our coming generation that being Jewish is a benefit, not a burden, a reward as well as a responsibility.

In Canada, North American Jews are confronted by a classic paradox of a pluralistic society. We desperately want to fully integrate into a society which until recently we were not allowed to; yet, we know that by doing so we may not be able to maintain ourselves as a unique, vibrant identifiable community.

The challenges facing Canadian Jewry are formidable. But we are a formidable people.

Associated redevelopment plans get 'green light'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The seven-year effort to redevelop the Neptune location of Associated Hebrew Schools appears to have born fruit.

The Ontario Ministry of Housing, under its jobsOntario Homes program, has recently approved a proposal for a community housing project for the elderly and those with disabilities on the site.

The Neptune Associated branch will be torn down, to be replaced by a new school for up to 300 preschool and elementary students. The new facility will include a full gymnasium/auditorium, a library and an arts/computer room.

It is scheduled to open by September 1997.

The school has accepted in principle an offer to sell the land for the community housing project to the United Food and Commercial Workers, who have received an allocation under jobs Ontario Homes to construct the 100 unit residence.

The team who hammered out the project included representatives from Associated Hebrew Schools; Baycrest Centre; the Clarendon Foundation, which provides attendant care services for the physically challenged; the Kehilla Residential Program, a non-profit housing agency which develops and manages community housing for the Jewish community; and the Reena Foundation, which provides services to the developmentally challenged.

The changes will demand considerable shuffling for Associated students, staff, administration and parents.

At the end of this school year, the Neptune campus will close, and the students will move temporarily to a renovated Hurwich Centre on Finch. The Danilack Centre, Leslie campus, will be renovated to house the administrative offices.

Teaching and senior supervisory staff will also be moved around, to better serve the new student bodies and to ensure continuity between the different branches, according to a recent letter sent to school parents.

Lawyer Marc Koplowitz is a spokesperson for a group of parents who have some concerns about the whole project.

For one thing, the project is dependent on government funding for the assisted housing units. "We are coming to an election, and any government other than an NDP one could review the entire project."

School president Sheldon Goodman acknowledged that the concern is legitimate, but said that "The management committee and board are responsible entities. If the plans change for whatever reason, the changes will be re-evaluated at that time."

While "we have confidence that the people on the board and management committee are well meaning," Koplowitz said, the parents have been dissatisfied with the amount of communication from the school.

He noted that since this concern was expressed at a meeting last month, the situation has improved.

The parents also want to ensure that the transition to the other branches and then back again will be as "non-intrusive as possible," suggesting, for instance, keeping classes together.

Goodman said that everyone wants the process to be as easy as possible, and every effort is being made to make it so.

Koplowitz, who has recently been co-opted to the Associated board, said that "We are resigned for the time being to hoping for the best."

Hamilton JNF honors Steinberg

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — The hardest thing he'd ever done, confessed David Steinberg to appreciative laughter, "was being president of the shul."

That was 1968 and the shul was Beth Jacob Synagogue where Steinberg began the community involvement that culminated with his being honored at the recent Jewish National Fund (JNF) Negev Tribute Dinner.

Some 350 guests attended the dinner at Adas Israel Synagogue where Steinberg, 57, was praised for his many accomplishments and his dedicated service to the community.

A Hamiltonian, Steinberg is a senior judge for five family court centres. He has been credited by a colleague with being "the father of family law in Ontario" as a result of his contribution to the Federal Law Reform Commission, Family Law Project.

A former Hamilton United Jewish Appeal campaign chair and United Israel Appeal (UIA) Ontario region past chair, he is currently serving a second year as federation president.

Steinberg told of growing up in a warm and close-knit family with "a strong history of service" to the Jewish community; of his grandparents, Ethel and Max Walters, and great-grandparents, Hannah and Israel Steinberg, who were founding members of Ohav Tsedek congregation; of his mother, Sophie, and late father, Sam, both active volunteers. He paid tribute to his wife, the former Cele Fox of London, Ont.

"In the final analysis," said Steinberg, "those who work in the synagogue, federation, on the [UJA] campaign, do so to maintain the continuity of our tradition."

He was pleased, he said, that his children — daughters Ellen Holland and Tima, and son-in-law Laury — "are carrying on the tradition of tzedakah."

Close friends and fellow lawyers Milt Lewis and 1993 Negev honoree Gerald Swaye made the official presentation. Hamilton West MP Stan Keyes, Ontario minister of housing Richard Allen, alderman Marvin Caplan representing Mayor Bob Morrow, regional chair Terry Cooke and federation president-elect Judge George Czutrin brought greetings.

Deputy Consul General Haim Waxman spoke briefly on the challenges still facing Israel, and JNF Canada executive vice-president, Avner Regev, made a special presentation to Keren Kayemeth representative Yoram Gordon who returns to Israel this summer after three years in Hamilton.

"Last year was the best ever," said Hamilton JNF president Sharon Marcovitz Hart before presenting the Bernard M. Bloomfield Medal for outstanding service to longtime volunteer Al Cohen. Dinner chair was William Morris.

Senator says men unfairly blamed for violence

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The issue of domestic violence has deteriorated into a "politically correct" attack on men, which views them as "innate progenitors of violence," against a wife who is always "passive, an innocent victim," charges Senator Anne Cools.

Cools was speaking as part of a recent seminar on family violence sponsored by Na'amat Toronto.

She said abuse should be seen as a "physical expression of aggression" which is perpetrated just as often by women as by men.

She quoted a chilling series of statistics showing, among other things: mothers are responsible for 63 per cent of child deaths; in 64 per cent of child abuse cases in Iowa, the abuser was the biological mother; men and women perpetrate violence equally.

"The emphasis on violence against women instead of on violence in the family implies the moral inferiority of men," said Cools. This "produces theories and policies so fatally flawed that they are likely to create only more problems."

A member of the audience said Cool's analysis ignored the fact that women, especially in single parent families, suffer disproportionally from poverty, overwork and extreme stress.

Cool replied that women in that situation "were not likely to abuse their children. It's young kids who choose to have babies, choose to be supported by the public purse and then choose to have more babies."

Another audience member asked whether the glorification of the military in Israel had led to the escalation of family violence there. Cool said the military ethos there comes from stark necessity.

Sharon Shenhav, director of legal services for Na'amat in Jerusalem, agreed that violence "is a family problem, not a male/female or a feminist problem."

Those who abuse, she said, "need to control. They have to have all the power. Those who don't let them, get punished."

To stop the cycle of violence, she said, family violence must be seen as a crime by the police, the justice system and family members themselves.

Counselling and therapy are essential, she said, noting that a new shelter being built by Na'amat in Tel Aviv has extensive facilities for that purpose.

There is, however, the danger that "men will stop physical abuse but will turn to emotional abuse instead. And that's a harder thing to bring to the courts."

A new civil protection order is available in Israel, through which a woman can go to the home of a judge, "even in the middle of the night." If she can show she is in danger, she can get the abuser out of the house.

Shelters, she said, are important, but "if the woman must leave her home and take the children away from school, who has won? The victim is being punished."

The new centre, she said, is being built in an upper middle class area "so that it is seen that [being battered] is not a stigma. The victim is not a criminal."

Family law lawyer Albert Weisbrot explained that his responsibility is to help his client in such matters as child custody, support and the matrimonial home. "I can't worry that the husband needs therapy. My job is not to be a mediator," he said.

He noted that the Ontario court system says violence between spouses is not relevant to custody or money issues.

CFRB talk-show host Andy Barrie moderated the seminar.

Older women having more premature babies

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Well-off older women are giving birth to an increasing number of premature babies, skewing the demographics away from the poverty-stricken teen mothers of the past, a neonatologist at the Hospital for Sick Children said recently.

Dr. Jonathan Hillman said these older women, many over 35, are using reproductive technologies to conceive, resulting in multiple pregnancies with their attendant risk of premature birth.

"This is the flip side of progress," he said.

Hillman was speaking at a public forum on premature births at Beth Tzedec Synagogue sponsored by the Toronto New Leadership Division of the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation.

Though there have been advances in saving the lives of tiny prematures, Hillman said it is a "mixed blessing" since there is a higher incidence of later problems.

The latest medical evidence is that 24 weeks is the earliest at which it is practical to save prematures, he said.

"There is clear evidence that there will be learning disabilities if they (prematures) are very small," said Dr. Arne Ohlsson, a staff neonatologist at Women's College Hospital.

If all pregnant women stopped smoking it would lead to a 15 per cent reduction in premature births, Ohlsson said.

Advances in neonatal care at Shaare Zedek Hospital in Jerusalem have resulted in only seven fatalities in 1,000 premature births, said forum moderator Dr. Michael Wilschanski, a Shaare Zedek pediatrician completing his fellowship at the Hospital for Sick Children.

There is now a 50 per cent chance of survival in that hospital for premature babies who are born weighing under 700 grams (1 lb. 7 oz.), Wilschanski said.

Women take part in bnot mitzvah

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — At a recent Shabbat service at Adath Sholom Synagogue, 12 women achieved a dream they have had for most of their lives.

After more than six months of studying with Cantor Martin Rosenblum, spiritual leader of the synagogue, the women, some seniors, were called to the Torah as bnot mitzvah.

Shae Eckler, who turned 66 years old in the winter, and whose husband had his bar mitzvah at Adath Sholom only 16 years ago, said the "bat mitzvah was a perfect way to commemorate my birthday. My family is very proud."

Vicki Rumack, originally from Calgary, says that "finally, all my years of cheder paid off. My son wanted to know how many children have the privilege of watching their mother become a bat mitzvah."

Studied with cantor

The women said that they originally approached Rosenblum with the idea of having a bnot mitzvah service when the men had their group bat mitzvah 16 years ago.

They studied with the cantor once a week and they agreed that learning to chant was the most challenging part of the process.

Rosenblum said that he was "delighted and proud to be part of the ceremony. It was a joyous and proud occasion in the lives of women who were never given the opportunity to celebrate this spiritually rewarding and unique Jewish ritual.

"The joyous occasion was shared by their families and friends, the congregation and by the Jewish community. I hope that this is the start of many women coming forward and being fulfilled as bnot mitzvah collectively and individually."

The other bnot mitvah were Miriam Breslow, Helen Batcher, Norma Gelade, Bunnie Bross, Carol Kreidstein, Carol Modlin, Marilyn Rosenblum, Helen Sieber, Pam Weber and Sophie Dunkelman.

TORONTO — Jacques Perez, chef for more than 20 years at Camp Northland-B'nai Brith and Maple Lake Resort and a founding member of Toronto's Sephardi community, died April 27 of cancer. He was 68.

Perez, who was born in Morocco, trained at the famed Cordon Bleu cooking school in Paris before coming to Toronto with his family in 1958.

"He loved his food and his children with equal dedication," said daughter Michelle Perez.

That dedication extended to the teen campers and kitchen staff at the Haliburton, Ont., camp, where Perez worked from 1965 until 1983.

Perez later became executive chef at Maple Lake Resort in Parry Sound, Ont., after closing his Toronto restaurant Always, in the Bathurst-Eglinton area. He retired in 1992.

Perez was a founding member of the Ontario Sephardic Association and taught cuisine at George Brown College. He belonged to Magen David Congregation.

Perez is survived by wife Esther; daughters Annie, Linda, Michelle and Karen; and four grandchildren.

Bonds cancels meeting featuring disbarred lawyer

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — State of Israel Bonds has cancelled a June 20 breakfast that was to have featured Julius Melnitzer as guest speaker.

Melnitzer is a disbarred London, Ont. lawyer who was jailed for defrauding banks and individuals of some $80 million. He was to have spoken on Jailhouse Jews, Brothers in Isolation.

The meeting was planned by Bonds' lawyers' division.

But it was cancelled last Thursday after "several" calls and letters of protests were received, said division account executive Jacques Vogler.

In the end, "we didn't feel right about it," Vogler said.

Upon learning that Melnitzer was going to address the meeting, former division chair Bert Raphael fired off an angry letter to Bonds executive director Larry Waller, saying he was "shocked and appalled," and he urged the breakfast be cancelled.

"I find it unbelievable that you would select Mr. Melnitzer as a speaker," Raphael wrote.

He later told The CJN he was glad the breakfast was cancelled.

David Salomon, co-chair of the lawyer's division, told The CJN Melnitzer was chosen because "he was seen as an interesting speaker, and people would attend."

Once a star criminal lawyer, Melnitzer, 47, pleaded guilty in December 1991 to 43 counts of fraud, forgery and attempted fraud relating to transactions which swindled Canadian banks and financial institutions out of $67 million.

The charges included attempts to bilk another $33 million, as well as forging stock certificates with a value of more than $1 billion.

He also admitted to defrauding his former law partners, business associates and friends of $14.7 million in a phony land deal. In all, it was one of the largest fraud cases in Canadian history.

Melnitzer was sentenced to nine years in jail, was disbarred and declared bankrupt. He was released last year, owing an estimated $20 million in compensation to his victims.

JOINT SHABBATON

A unique joint school Shabbaton was held between United Synagogue Day School in Toronto and Solomon Schecter Academy in Montreal at Camp Reena in Ontario. Together with teachers from the schools, and counsellors from Ramah, USY and Koach, almost 100 Grade 6 students had an opportunity to experience the meaning of Shabbat. Seen at the Havdalah ceremony are (from left) Shira Goldberg, Ami Sabari, Sabreena Peters and Joanna Lazier.

Trust, caring said cure for societal stress

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Skyrocketing levels of stress and dysfunction in families can only be stopped by regaining a sense of community and shared responsibility, the annual meeting of Jewish Family & Child Services (JF&CS) heard last week.

Guest speaker Dr. Paul Steinhauer, a professor of psychiatry at the University of Toronto, enumerated how stress affects modern families, especially children and teens.

A 1989 study found that 18 per cent of children and adolescents in Ontario had at least one diagnosable mental disorder, and of those, only one in six had received treatment, Steinhauer said.

In 1994, a quarter of those aged 15 to 24 had at least one mental disorder, with the suicide rate doubling among those aged 10 to 14 and increasing fourfold in adolescent males, he noted.

The national school dropout rate stands at 18 per cent, with aggressive behavior in students rising, and almost half of all teens reported trouble sleeping because of stress, he added.

That stress, he explained, springs from the many pressures facing modern families: 75 per cent of all families need two incomes; parents spend less time with their children than ever before; the divorce rate is 10 times what it was 50 years ago; and 21 per cent of Canadian children live in poverty.

Society, Steinhauer admonished, must regain "the high levels of shared ideals and trust" which existed just after World War II. "We've lost our sense of trusting and caring."

Children, he said, need a sense of community, security and of seeing adults around them sharing the job of child rearing.

In his remarks, JF&CS executive director Gordon Wolfe noted the "raw and blatant mean-spiritedness around us," especially increasing intolerance toward the poor. "We tend to blame the victim," he said.

Wolfe was presented with a commendation from Michael Kerbel of the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC). For the last four months, Wolfe split his duties between JF&CS and running the BJC on an interim basis.

Wolfe announced that JF&CS last year had a balanced budget.

Michael Brown was confirmed as the new JF&CS president, replacing Garry Foster.

The agency last year served more than 10,000 clients, one-third of them below the poverty line. Those requiring financial assistance increased almost seven per cent in 1994 over the year before, the meeting heard.

JF&CS last year investigated 226 reports of child abuse.

Integrated school aids disabled

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Can young children with physical or mental disabilities manage successfully in a preschool program with their non-disabled peers?

Gan Harmony, a preschool in the Har Nof district of Jerusalem, has shown that not only can the disabled benefit from integration, but the other students excel both in academic development and as mentshen.

So says Joan Shrensky, founder of Gan Harmony, who was in Toronto recently on a North American fundraising tour.

She spoke to The CJN before a parlor meeting at the home of lawyer Benjamin Rubin.

The Orthodox school began in 1985 with 14 students and now has 50, with further outreach to 250 students throughout Israel.

Students receive speech, occupational, physio, play, music and art therapies. They range in age from 1½ to six.

Shrensky makes every attempt to mainstream the disabled youngsters into regular schools. "If a school needs a ramp for a child in a wheelchair, if they won't build it, then we will," she said.

Gan Harmony staff works with schools and students "from Kiryat Shemona to Eilat," she said.

The school also has support groups for siblings and parents of disabled children.

Shrensky recently received approval to open a 6,500-sq.ft. integration centre in Jerusalem for disabled and non-disabled children and adults to enjoy social and educational programs together.

Eliyahu Goldberg, a Toronto-born child with Down's syndrome, is the first Gan Harmony student to celebrate a bar mitzvah. He told his guests, "I know G-d loves me. He gave me a voice to sing, and a heart. He created me and gave me life."

For more information, contact Gan Harmony, c/o Dr. R. Erlich, 1746 Bayview Ave., Toronto, M4G 3C4.

Former Canadian ambassador lauds his native Winnipeg

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Allan Gotlieb thinks he has the answer to what makes Winnipeg special and why this city has produced so many talented people.

"The great Russian ballet impressario, Sergei Diaghilev once was asked what makes a city great," Gotlieb said. "His answer was that a great city had an element of astonishment, a sense of excitement. Winnipeg was an exciting city. There was an intellectual intensity to life here, a sense of things happening, as well as a sense of common identity fostered by the cold and the isolation."

The former Canadian ambassador to the United States and his wife, Sondra, both originally from Winnipeg, were the guests at the Shaarey Zedek recently, in the first of a series of talks planned by prominent Jewish Winnipeggers and former residents, co-sponsored by the New Leadership Division, Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University (CFHU) Winnipeg chapter and the Congregation Shaarey Zedek.

While Sondra, an award-winning author and columnist in her own right, reminisced mainly about a happy childhood in Winnipeg's heavily Jewish north end in the 1930s and '40s, her husband had quite a different story to tell.

Allan Gotlieb grew up in south Winnipeg. Today about half of Winnipeg's Jewish population lives in the affluent area. In the 1930s, however, the neighborhood had only a handful of Jewish families, who faced anti-Semitism and isolation.

Gotlieb remembers being told by non-Jewish children that they couldn't play with him because he was Jewish. He recalled abusive phone calls, his books being scribbled on, being made to feel different.

The world he knew was primarily the dozen or so other Jewish children living in south Winnipeg. He said he had only a vague concept of a larger Jewish community in north Winnipeg, where most people were poor.

A turning point in his life came when his mother started a Young Judaea group in the south end and it amalgamated with a north end group.

"I was introduced to the remarkable reality that was Winnipeg," he recalled. "The Jewish community was teaming with intellectual life — most of it of the leftist variety. I was totally entranced and became a passionate Zionist."

He remembered with fondness the cafes and restaurants packed, despite the cold, with young people sitting around and arguing.

"Winnipeg was a multicultural city before multiculturalism was invented," he said. 'Winnipeg was plunged into the world in a way that the eastern industrial cities were not ... Winnipeg became my yardstick for judging other cities."

Anya Makow, executive director of the CFHU Winnipeg chapter, says the lecture series was created because the city has spawned so many people who have achieved in a variety of fields.

Wiesel addresses London audience

By SUSAN MERSKEY
Special to The CJN

LONDON — Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel was the keynote speaker at the annual Bereavement Conference held here last month.

About 1,200 people, including conference delegates and members of the Jewish community, attended Wiesel's public lecture on The Question of Job, listening to him in a rapt silence.

Wiesel reminded his audience that just as Job experienced the death of all the children from his first marriage, so did many Jews during the Holocaust. Job's reactions as a bereaved parent are similar to those today, Wiesel said.

The Children and Bereavement conference was organized by the King's College Centre for Education about Death and Bereavement.

Wiesel said he is uneasy with the ending of Job's story. Although he had a second family, and died "saturated with years," was he really happy?, he asked. How did his second family feel about the siblings who had perished so many years earlier?

Drawing a parallel with the experiences of some "second family" children of Holocaust survivors, he wondered whether any of Job's second family felt guilty that they had lived while the others died, or felt their father regarded them as poor substitutes for their dead siblings.

Wiesel touched briefly on his own wartime experiences. In response to a question, he said his love of study, especially of Torah, gave him the courage to endure, and has continued to do so throughout his life.

Children are the foundation of the world, which cannot survive without them, he said.

John Morgan, head of the Centre for Death and Bereavement Education, said 80 per cent of the children who die in North America die violently. Judaism teaches that we can only be truly ourselves if we live for others, strive to prevent suffering and violent death, and become activists, he said.

Russian Jewish couples to wed at gala affair

At the fourth Gala Wedding on June 13, 10 Jewish couples from Russia will be wed simultaneously by Jewish law.

Denied a Jewish wedding in the former Soviet Union, these couples were previously married only by civil law.

"Everyone in the community is invited to attend this historic and happy occasion," says Rabbi Yoseph Y. Zaltzman, founder and executive director of the Jewish Russian Community Centre of Greater Toronto (JRC), and host of the fourth Gala Wedding.

The event will be held at the Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue, 613 Clark Ave. W,, Thornhill. Media representatives will arrive at 6 p.m. for the chupah. More than 2,000 guests will attend the marriage ceremonies, which will be followed by dancing and celebrations.

The JRC is expecting an overflow crowd for the wedding dinner at 7 p.m. featuring a live orchestra, Russian dancers, singing and dancing.

The event is also a fundraiser for the JRC, which provides services and programs to the over 25,000 Russian Jews living in Toronto, who have suffered religious oppression for the last 70 years and now are reconnecting with their roots in Judaism.

The JRC has a synagogue, a library and weekly classes on Jewish and general topics. In addition, to publishing Exodus, a monthly Russian newspaper, the JRC sponsors a youth group, a women's group, English classes, children's afternoon school, day care and a host of religious, social and cultural events.

For more information call Arlene Weisbart, wedding coordinator, at the JRC, 416-222-7105.

Chrétien pledges stiffer hate crime sentences to establish the Dan Family Multi-Media Centre at Yad Vashem, which will be housed in the Canada Pavilion of the planned Central School for Holocaust Studies.

Also announced was the creation of the Canadian chair for Holocaust Studies at Yad Vashem, to be awarded to a deserving scholar.

Joining the prime minister were cabinet ministers Herb Gray, Art Eggleton, Sergio Marchi, Allan Rock and David Collenette, and a who's who of the Jewish community.

Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin sent regards via videotape, thanking Chrétien and the Canadian Jewish community for doing "whatever is needed and possible to make sure that a Holocaust will not happen again."

Canadian Society for Yad Vashem chair Joel Dimitry praised the Liberals as "the first government in 50 years to remove war criminals from our midst, no matter how old or ill."

Chrétien spoke solemnly of the Holocaust, telling the audience, "You do not need lessons in remembrance.

"Six million men, women and children whose only crime was being Jewish, slaughtered in the most efficient, mechanized, monstrous killing machine ever constructed. Six million lives brutally ended. Centuries-old communities wiped out. That is the reality of the Holocaust, a reality we must never forget."

Canada has been fortunate "that so many Holocaust survivors chose to rebuild their lives" here. "Your contribution to our communities and our country have made us stronger and richer. Your courage and resilience have been examples to all of us."

Holocaust deniers "are not welcome in Canada. Their twisted arguments are really just a mask for racism and hatred and a final injury to all those who perished and suffered in the Holocaust — an injury that will not be tolerated."

Chrétien alluded to the Canadian government's dismal record of admitting Jews during the war years: "As a nation, we turned our backs on Jewish refugees from Europe when we could have saved lives, when we should have saved lives. Instead, we washed our hands and we all know the tragic consequences."

The hate crime legislation, Bill C-41, "is our commitment to a tolerant, free society."

The bill would mete out harsher punishments for hate crimes based on religion, race, color, sexual orientation and other factors.

Long awaited by the Jewish community, the bill is currently tied up in the Liberal caucus, where some members remain strongly opposed to it for what they say is its recognition and even legitimization of homosexuality.

Chrétien was presented with one of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem's stylized candelabras and with a scroll by Avner Shalev, chair of Yad Vashem in Jerusalem, making the prime minister an honorary trustee of the institution.

Shalev also presented Dan with a specially struck medal from Yad Vashem.

Dan, chair and CEO of Novopharm Inc. and a Holocaust survivor, said little did he know, when he was wandering the streets of war-ravaged Budapest in 1944, that he would have "the special honor and distinction" of introducing Canada's prime minister.

The multi-media centre in Dan's name will house computers, films, photos, recordings and millions of archives, all of which organizers say will be available one day on the Internet.

Israeli ambassador to Canada Itzhak Shelef pointed out that the dinner fell on the 33rd anniversary of the execution in Israel of top Nazi henchman Adolf Eichmann.

Cantor Louis Danto chanted the K'El Maleh Rachamim and sang the Partisans' Song, while Rabbi Erwin Schild delivered the invocation.

Embassy move predicted

Critics of renewal argue that the PNA does not deserve further funding because it has failed to rein in terrorism. Satloff said that while the PNA cannot completely stamp out terrorism, it can and should make more of an effort.

He is favorably disposed to sending U.S. observers to the Golan Heights to monitor a peace agreement between Israel and Syria.

Hopeful but not optimistic about the prospects of a diplomatic breakthrough on this front within the coming months, Satloff said the Syrians are in no hurry to sign a peace pact with Israel. "The urgency on Syria's part to alter the status quo is not very strong."

Substance abuse forum proves an eye-opener

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An unannounced speaker at a recent forum on Women and Substance Abuse brought a powerful message to an audience of about 175.

The woman, who prefers not to be identified, is a young mother and recovering heroin addict who spent a year in a rehabilitation centre and now helps other addicts. The product of a traditional Jewish home, she exhorted the Jewish community to raise awareness about the extent of addiction in the community and in schools.

"We have too many Jewish heroin addicts in Ontario. This does not include cocaine, hash, marijuana, LSD or alcohol. We can't say, 'Is there a problem?' We have to say, 'How severe is the problem?' "

To address the problem of Women and Substance Abuse, the social and political action committee of Jewish Women's Federation (JWF) presented the forum, featuring speakers Dr. Bonnie Madonik, director of medical services at the Donwood Institute; therapist Rochelle Thompson, a certified alcohol and drug counsellor and consultant for Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS); and Freda Muscovitch, coordinator of the drug and alcohol network component, undergraduate medical education, University of Toronto. Jill Reitman, vice-president of JWF, was moderator.

Madonik detailed differences between men and women with regard to drugs. She noted, for example that women reach higher peak levels of alcohol in the blood than men, even when they have consumed the same amount per body weight.

She described alcohol as "a powerful and potentially addictive drug. Socially sanctioned drugs are particularly dangerous because they are perceived as safe."

Tobacco kills three times more people than alcohol, AIDS, suicide, illicit drugs, car accidents and murder combined, Madonik noted.

She also emphasized the need to re-educate some doctors "who prescribe 30 to 60 [addictive] pills at a shot, with three to four repeats." When Madonik was in medical school "not so long ago, they didn't have one course in addiction," she noted.

Thompson addressed common myths, such as "Jews don't drink," which have created barriers for Jews who need help.

In the past five years, Thompson noted, JF&CS has worked to counter that myth, and a number of recovery groups have sprung up in local synagogues.

Thompson cautioned against believing that drug or alcohol abuse is not a problem if it's not a daily occurrence. Even in cases where the substance is not used every day, "People can die, families can be ruined," she said.

"Usually it's progressive. The earlier it's spotted, the easier it is to deal with."

Muscovitch said she'd like to see less judgmentalism and more knowledge about how to intervene in cases of drug abuse. She also criticized segregation within the Jewish community, particularly of the Orthodox sector, which "does not allow for sharing of resources and information."

Jewish Scouts mark 80 years

OTTAWA — Jewish Scouts are celebrating 80 years in Ottawa with a performance by the Israel Scout Friendship Caravan June 14 at the Agudath Israel synagogue.

All former members of the 39th Henry "Hank" Torontow Scouting Movement are invited to attend.

Scouting memorabilia is being collected for display as well as for the Ottawa Jewish Historical Society. Call Howard Osterer at 613-737-7525 for pickup.

Negev Dinner draws 325 people

By SUSAN MERSKEY
CJN Correspondent

LONDON — London's 1995 Negev Dinner drew 325 people to honor Sam and Frances Lerner at the University of Western Ontario last month.

Dinner chair Ellen Rosen welcomed representatives from the federal, provincial and municipal governments.

The tribute to the Lerners opened with a short video about JNF work in Israel, in particular the Reshafim Water Reservoir in the Beit She'an Valley. Dinner proceeds will go towards this project.

Sam Lerner, a practising lawyer for close to 40 years, overcame polio to rise through army ranks to become a lieutenant colonel.

"[He] has the gratitude, affection and respect of many lawyers in Canada; if there were more like him, we would have no fears for the future of the profession," said Ontario Law Society treasurer Paul Lamek.

The Lerners have worked in London with the Women's Christian Association, Parkwood Hospital and McCormick Homes.

Michael Lerner paid tribute to his parents on behalf of the family. He called his mother "devoted" to her husband, her family and the community; and his father "courageous."

IDF, Palestinians disagree over army pullout date

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The Israel Defence Force has set a Nov. 1 target for withdrawing from Arab population centres in the West Bank.

A senior IDF source told the Israeli daily Ha'aretz the army would not be prepared to withdraw before that date, given the preparations necessary for a redeployment.

Security sources were quoted as saying that redeployment would require the paving of some 70 miles of roads bypassing Arab population centres and to be used by Israeli patrols.

The planning and logistics branches of the army have completed the basic plan for a redeployment, which would include a preliminary stage of paving roads, according to Ha'aretz.

However, the redeployment date clashes with Palestinian plans to hold elections in the territories in September.

The chief Palestinian negotiator on elections, Saeb Erekat, said last week that the elections would take place two months after an expected July signing of an agreement for implementing the next phase of Palestinian self-rule.

The Palestinians want to hold elections only after the redeployment of Israeli troops takes place.

Israel and the Palestinians have set July 1 as a target date for reaching agreement on elections in the territories and an IDF redeployment.

A senior Israeli official said Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and PLO leader Yasser Arafat would probably meet later this month to resolve the differences.

Flyer's remains found in Egypt after 22 years

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The remains of an Israeli navigator downed over Egypt 22 years ago have been found in the Nile Delta region, Israel Radio reported.

Capt. Eran Cohen had been declared missing after his Phantom jet was shot down over the Nile Delta during the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

Israeli President Ezer Weizman, accompanied by senior Israel Defence Force officers, visited the Cohen family last week at Kibbutz Deganya Aleph near Tiberias, to inform them of the news.

Weizman later explained that during a visit to Cairo in December, he had asked Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak to give priority to the search for missing Israeli soldiers.

Weizman expressed gratitude to Mubarak for his cooperation. He added that accounts provided by Egyptian locals eventually led the search teams to the field where the body was found.

Accompanying Weizman to the Cohen residence was Maj.-Gen. Yoram Yair, head of the IDF Manpower Division. He explained the circumstances of Cohen's disappearance.

"Today we know that the plane was hit by a missile and split in two," Yair said. "The back half fell in one spot. The front part, with the engine and the pilot, about [a half-mile] from there.

"There were witnesses who said they saw Eran parachute to the ground, where he was set upon by villagers and beaten to death," said Yair.

But an examination of the body indicated that Cohen had been killed by the impact of the fall and had not been beaten by villagers, he added.

Yair said the search effort to find the bodies of other missing soldiers would continue.

A date for Cohen's funeral has not been set.

Grieving and peace: two views

By EMILY HAUSER

Ze'ev Rapp is a formidable presence. His deep voice pulls in listeners, his eyes pin them down.

Chain smoking as he talks, he lays out his opinions on the peace process, the Rabin government, and the Palestinians. Three years ago, he would not have felt the need to be so public with his thoughts; three years ago his daughter Helena was still alive.

Helena Rapp, 15 and from the Tel Aviv suburb of Bat Yam, was hacked to death by a Palestinian terrorist in May 1992. She was killed waiting for the bus to school.

The murder shook the nation, coming on the heels of a similar stabbing in which another Bat Yam girl was killed. The residents of the town staged violent protests, threatening to stream into Gaza and exact vengeance for the deaths. Ze'ev Rapp takes credit for convincing the crowds to calm down; today he is sorry he did.

"So what if we'd taken over Gaza? So what if one of my sons had killed an Arab? So he'd sit in jail. At least in jail I can visit him. Where can I visit him if he gets killed by a terrorist?"

Rapp firmly believes that if Israel's governments were tougher on the Palestinians, terrorism would stop. Helena was killed under a Likud government: her family now carries on under the current Labor coalition. He says neither has done enough.

THE TEXTURE OF LIFE IN ISRAEL

"My daughter and many others would still be alive if they had done what needed to be done. History proves that force can only be routed by force, not by logic."

Rapp's suggestions to the government are straightforward: the death sentence for killers, deportation for their families, and a wall around Gaza — "no one comes in, no one goes out."

The West Bank, he says, is part of Israel and must remain in Jewish hands. "If they want to stay here and obey Israeli law, fine. If not, they must leave ... But they must learn that they won't get a single inch of land by violence. Rapp says 95 per cent of terrorist attacks could be avoided.

Visitors are encouraged to look through albums of newspaper clippings following Helena's murder; the pictures reveal a young girl, laughing and playing around with friends. "She loved living," Rapp says with resignation. "She was studying photography and loved it. She was full of plans.

"The one thing I know my daughter knew absolutely is that her father would not let this go by unnoticed," he says, his mouth a grim line, his shoulders set. "I will not just move on with life."

There is one picture hanging in the office of Yitzhak Frankental, general secretary of Netivot Shalom, Israel's religious peace movement. It is of an Israeli soldier, goofing with a garden rake. He is Arik, Yitzhak Frankental's 18-year-old son, kidnapped and killed by Hamas last July.

Yitzhak Frankental's knitted yarmulka covers graying hair, and his gentleness is belied by his beefy size. "Arik hated the contempt shown Arabs, and saw the path we took with them [in occupation] as a tragedy," he says, his eyes filling with tears. "But he didn't know that he'd have to pay for it with his life."

The horrifying death of a beloved child at the hands of extremists would seem more than reason enough for fury, and it is often assumed that religious Israelis are right-wing. But Yitzhak Frankental, and the organization he heads, are proof that the lines are not nearly as clear as they seem.

"People don't understand that the lack of peace could, God forbid, bring about the destruction of Israel," Frankental says. "It must be clear: the peace that we talk about is peace with security, not peace in exchange for security."

Frankental has been active in Netivot Shalom for two years. The movement's philosophy is based on a Maimonides teaching: "The laws of the Torah are not meant to foster vengeance, but are aimed at increasing mercy, lovingkindness and peace in the world." A Netivot Shalom publication states: "While the Jewish people has a special relationship with the land of Israel, this attachment can never come before the sanctity of human life."

"I've taken on a mission ... because I think this people deserves that I dedicate myself to it," Frankental explains. But it is clear the task weighs on him heavily. He promised himself he would head the movement for two to three years, but now says: "I don't believe I'll be able to hold on indefinitely. I'm weaker than I was."

Asked what has sapped his strength, Frankental glances away. "The missing."

While he acknowledges his limitations, though, Frankental continues to canvas the country. He is one of the few supporters of the peace process who speaks in terms of Jewish law. "We are breaking very serious commandments with what we are doing [vis-a-vis the Palestinians]. There are two Jewish values which are important here: 'that which is hateful to you do not do unto others,' and 'justice, justice pursue'."

Indeed, Frankental and Netivot Shalom are willing to go farther than many secular leftists. When Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin came to pay condolence in the wake of Arik's death, the grieving father advised him to tell Yasser Arafat that Israel would accept the establishment of a Palestinian state.

Frankental acknowledges the position he advocates is difficult: "This is not peace yet, this is a process, and we all understand that the process is hard, and cruel." He is frustrated this keeps many who support Netivot Shalom from joining. "We have to bring about quick changes in the way people think, and for that, we need a lot of resources.

"Only if we understand that the Arab is a human just as the Jew is, only then will we be able to find a common ground for peace ... As I knew Arik, if he could, he would be shouting at me: 'Carry on, Daddy, carry on'," Yitzhak Frankental says quietly. "If we had made peace already, Arik wouldn't have been murdered."

Israel's north rebounds after rocket attack

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Life returned to normal for residents of the north last week, after a rocket attack by Hezbollah terrorists.

In a statement released in Lebanon, Hezbollah said the attack last Tuesday night was in retaliation for the shelling a day earlier of the village of Shakra, north of the southern Lebanon security zone.

A 12-year-old girl was reportedly killed and two other youths injured in the shelling.

Eight Katyusha rockets fell inside Israel, causing minor damage but no injuries.

In Israel, residents of Kiryat Shmona called on the government to take action to prevent future attacks.

Mayor Prosper Azran said residents of the town feel as though they are living under a military regime.

"In the last 27 years, more than 1,700 missiles have fallen, more than 1,000 buildings were damaged, more than 300 people were injured and 40 people died," he told Israel Radio. "We're tired of this kind of life."

May 29:

• According to a report in Ha'aretz Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin reiterated to a meeting of Labor Knesset members that the government would submit any potential peace agreement with Syria to a national referendum. The Ministry of Justice is said to be studying precedents for draft referendum bills from Switzerland and Scandinavian countries.

• The Bank of Israel announced that the central interest rate will be lowered by 0.5% to 13.5%. The Governor of the Bank of Israel Jacob Frenkel believes the rate of inflation for 1995 will be 8 to 11% .

May 30:

• Kol Israel reported that Paraguay will extradite to Argentina seven Brazilian nationals suspected of involvement in the 1992 bombing of the Israeli embassy in Buenos Aires in which 29 people were killed and over 100 were injured. Five of the suspects are reportedly of Lebanese origin.

• Kol Israel reported that a delegation from the European Union will arrive soon in Israel to begin preparations for the international observer team that will oversee elections in the territories which are scheduled to take place three months after Israel and the Palestinians conclude an agreement on the issue. The target date for the completion of the agreement is July 1.

• Speaking before the Knesset's Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee, Deputy IDF Chief of Staff Maj. General Matan Vilna'i said that Israel has recently successfully prevented a number of attacks from Hizbullah, its main enemy in south Lebanon. He also testified that there has been a reduction in the number of attacks against Israelis in the West Bank and from Gaza.

May 31:

• Ma'ariv reported American Express will soon issue credit cards in Israel through Bank Hapoalim. In their market research the company found that Israelis are frequent credit card users, especially for travel and shopping services.

June 1:

• Kol Israel reported that Jordan expelled two leaders of Hamas, Musa Abd Abu Marzuk and Imad el-Alami. The leader of the Hamas movement in Jordan, Ibrahim Osah stated however, that the expulsions will not result in a change of Hamas' principles.

New magazine recounts acts of kindness

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Corresondent

JERUSALEM — What makes Jeff Friedman spend his time singing to the dying? Why did a middle-aged couple move to Israel and adopt four disabled or abused children?

These and other stories of chesed (kindness) are found in a new bi-annual, English-language magazine called QUARK — Quite Unusual Acts of Remarkable Kindness, published by Jerusalem's Pardes Institute of Jewish Studies.

The intent is to "illuminate some of the countless acts of remarkable kindness (gemilut chesed) that take place in Israel," says American-born editor Jane Kimchi.

She admits she had doubts about the idea when it was first proposed by artist David Moss and acted upon by Rabbi Levi Lauer, former director of Pardes.

"A magazine about goodness? Who on earth would want to read about that?"

Then Kimchi remembered the story of a young woman in California who risked her life in an attempt to save her swimming companion from a shark. The story received endless media coverage. "That's when I realized goodness can be fascinating.

"In Israel we have our own heroes and heroines who capture the limelight," she says, recalling two poignant examples: an observant Jewish woman who, in the wake of a knifing in a crowded Jerusalem market, shielded the Arab suspect from an angry mob; and an Arab garage owner, who died trying to save a Jewish woman from a knife-wielding terrorist in Jaffa.

"These two incidents made news because of the combination of violence and political drama," writes Kimchi in her first editorial. "But there are also a great many untold stories of people who give of themselves to others, not in a brief moment of daring, but rather as an ongoing aspect of their daily lives."

QUARK is filled with their stories. Shlomo and Chaya Dagan are a middle-aged couple who left their grown-up children in Australia to start a new life in Israel, adopting four children in desperate need of a home. Jeff Friedman, a social worker and musician, uses his music to soothe the terminally ill. Meir Abelson, a former RAF pilot, is now a big brother to dozens of slum kids. And Clara Hammer, an 83-year-old great grandmother, provides chickens for poor families who can't afford meat.

"What makes these people give of themselves? That's one of the questions that intrigues me," says Kimchi. "You don't have to be one of the three Rs — rich, religious or retired — to find time for chesed," she says, noting that many of the people featured in the magazine are professionals with full-time jobs, families and otherwise hectic days.

Some do it out of religious obligation, regarding chesed as an important mitzvah; others, including many Holocaust survivors, have made a vow to help others after their own close brush with death. There are instinctive givers — what Kimchi calls "tender souls" — and accidental doers of chesed — a category into which she herself fits.

Years ago, in an effort to improve her Hebrew, Kimchi decided to spend a couple of days a week volunteering at Alyn, an orthopedic hospital for children in Jerusalem. There she met a child who was born paralyzed and had been abandoned by his parents. Kimchi fell in love with him. She and her husband, Jeff, adopted the boy, who has lived with them ever since.

"It always annoys me when people say what a great mitzvah I have done. I didn't do it as an act of chesed. I simply fell in love with the boy," she says. "He is a gift. He teaches me so much I feel humbled by him.

"It just goes to show you that you don't have to be a tzaddik [a righteous person] to commit an act of chesed," she says. "I'm the best example of that," she laughs.

The magazine has over 6,000 readers in Israel, North America and Europe. "I get calls from people who have read an article and feel inspired to do some act of chesed," notes Kimchi, who directs such callers to one of the many projects on her list.

"The long-term goal is to go beyond a magazine and launch a much larger project. We want to encourage people to engage in chesed," she says. This is part of the mandate of the Pardes Institute.

She hopes that QUARK, which has a number of non-Jewish subscribers, will also serve another purpose — to educate.

"Chesed is intrinsic to Judaism, but this is not widely recognized. There is an emphasis not only on tzedakah or charity, but on giving of yourself. I want to draw attention to this. You can call it public relations for the Jewish people."

Jews feel excluded from Shabbat hearing

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — Jewish activists are protesting plans by a House subcommittee to hold a hearing on Shabbat to explore national attitudes about religious liberties and prayer in the public schools.

Despite the protest, the chair of the subcommittee has refused to reschedule the June 10 hearing.

"It's my experience that there are people in the Jewish community who participate in community activities on Saturdays," Charles Canady, chair of the House judiciary subcommittee on the constitution, said in a telephone interview.

The controversy has arisen because a "religious equality amendment" is about to be introduced in Congress.

Canady's subcommittee will be holding hearings on the controversial amendment, which is being spearheaded by the Christian Coalition.

The field hearing is set for Harrisonburg, Va., an area with a Jewish population of 370, according to the 1994 American Jewish Yearbook.

Field hearings are typically held outside Capitol Hill, and members of the community are invited to speak.

Although final language for a religious equality amendment has not yet been determined, the goals, as outlined by the Christian Coalition, include the allowance of some forms of prayer in public schools.

The amendment also is expected to give religion the same protections as speech under the Constitution.

The Harrisonburg hearing will focus on these issues, over which Jewish groups have expressed grave concerns.

Barney Frank, the only Jew on the subcommittee and its ranking minority member, said in an interview, "Given this particular topic, and the religious questions involved, I think it was a mistake" to schedule the field hearing for a Saturday.

Jewish activists agreed.

Bank employees indicted

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Ten senior Bank Discount employees were indicted last week on charges of stock manipulation, fraud and conspiracy in what the Securities Authority described as the "largest white-collar crime case ever."

In two separate indictments, spreading over hundreds of pages, the state attorney's tax and finance department accuses Yitzhak Cohen, Aryeh Adler, Teddy Saguy, Ofer Heldstein, David Weinman, Efraim Kutchinsky, Ehud Ya'acov, Mordechai Merkado, Michael Oron and his daughter Rinat of stock manipulation during 1993 and 1994.

Among the shares manipulated were those of Keren Makefet and the Ports and Railways Authority.

Some of the accused are also charged with artificially raising stock prices and sharing the profits.

Building Bridges

Women can create a positive atmosphere for co-existence. Na'amat Israel's Department of Working recently organized a landmark meeting. Representatives from Na'amat and FHIDA, the largest democratic women's organization in Gaza with 3000 members, met a Kibbutz Kfar Aza to discuss future co-operation of the two movements.

"Hand in Hand"

Na'amat Canada's newest project, "Hand in Hand" is designed to work hand in hand with Na'amat Israel, the leading social service agency in the country. The project was designed to help finance the work of the Na'amat departments devoted to women's issues. Na'amat has over 30 legal offices throughout Israel and staffed by lawyers who provide free legal services to women. Typical clients are widows with financial or estate problems, single mothers, abused women, divorcees with child custody problems and women seeking a "Get." Na'amat's legal department also drafts legislative proposals dealing with the status of women and their legal rights.

Child Support: New Idea Spells Chaos PART 2 OF 2

In the May 25 issue I discussed a $300 million government tax windfall that may result if child support payments can no longer be deduced by the non-custodial parent. The government hopes to use this money to assist the children of low-income families, whether the parents of such families are separated or not.

The plan will also assist many women who have child support payments that fail to incorporate an adequate amount for taxes on such payments.

However, it will unfairly penalize many men who are paying child support at a level which did incorporate adequate compensation for the wife's anticipated taxes. Often such men negotiated or litigated over child support and became obliged to pay anywhere from twenty to fifty percent more for child support only because of the need to compensate the wife for her tax liability.

If the government proceeds with its plans, such men will be able to go back to the Court and argue that that the new inability to deduct support constitutes a "material change" and that the amount they pay should be lowered substantially. The courts, which are already overburdened, will be flooded. Many women will oppose such applications on the grounds that the child's needs have increased or that the original settlement was insufficient to begin with. Many men may reduce or stop paying support altogether, which will also result in litigation. A few new "precedent cases" to clarify the rules won't work, because every fact situation will beg the question of "material change." Whatever benefits some women might gain could be lost, in part, by ensuing litigation or its threat. This is already happening. I'm already getting calls and the government's ideas are not even yet in the form of a draft Bill before parliament.

Unless the government can tackle this practical problem of how to handle existing orders and settlements, my family may become the only real financial beneficiaries of its plans. Even the government's projected $300 million windfall that would result from such changes may never be collected, since I predict a rebellion among the men who are already paying the recipients' taxes.

Japanese host Holocaust seminar

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TOKYO — Trying to bridge a cultural gap "as wide as the Grand Canyon" between Japanese and Jews, a leading Tokyo publishing house and the Simon Wiesenthal Centre recently conducted an unprecedented seminar on the Holocaust.

The three-day session in the Japanese capital last week was organized by the respected Bungei Shunju publishers for 120 of its editors and reporters.

The goals were to eliminate stereotypes and offer a kind of penance for the Holocaust denial article carried by one of its magazines in February, according to organizers.

Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Los Angeles-based Wiesenthal Centre and the seminar leader, said he was challenged not only by Japanese misunderstanding of the Holocaust, but of the Jewish people in general.

Although there are only 2,000 Jews in Japan, and few Japanese have ever met a Jew, there is a thriving cottage industry in anti-Semitic books and articles in the country.

Some of the attacks hark back to medieval stereotypes, but the main emphasis is on alleged international Jewish plots to dominate and destroy the Japanese economy.

Even more ominously, the Aum Supreme Truth religious sect, accused of perpetrating poison gas attacks in Tokyo subways in March, venerates Adolf Hitler and uses his writings in its schools, the Los Angeles Times recently reported.

Rabbi Cooper said even though he had been warned that there would be an excessive amount of politeness at the conference, he and his colleagues were faced by some very blunt questions.

Part of the discussion arose out of a widespread Japanese assumption that in any conflict, both sides must bear some of the blame, Rabbi Cooper said.

For instance, one editor wondered whether, given their long history of victimization, the Jews themselves did not bear some of the responsibility for their fate.

Rabbi Daniel Landes, national education director for the Wiesenthal Centre, responded that the assumption was similar to blaming a woman who has been raped because "she asked for it."

Shimazu also challenged Jews and Japanese to reveal their flaws to each other as the basis for future friendship. He cited the belief held by some that Jews consider themselves superior to others as the "chosen people."

Rabbi Cooper said the seminar confirmed his belief that Japanese attitudes toward Jews are marked by contradictions.

He recalled that during his first trip to Tokyo 10 years ago, he went to a bookstore and picked up two popular volumes, The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, exposed long ago as a crude anti-Semitic forgery, and The Diary of Anne Frank, which has sold five million copies in Japan.

Both books were published at the time by Bungei.

The lead-up to the seminar began when Bungei's glossy monthly magazine Marco Polo published a 10-page article with an editorial endorsement, denying the existence of the gas chambers and the mass killing of Jews at Auschwitz.

The Wiesenthal Centre and the American Jewish Committee filed strong protests and Rabbi Cooper called for an immediate — and highly successful — advertising boycott of the magazine.

Within a week, Kengo Tanaka, Bungei's president and CEO, announced that he was shutting down Marco Polo and withdrawing all unsold copies.

At the time, Tanaka acknowledged his company's "overall lack of understanding" of the Holocaust.

He said, "We will do everything in our power to educate ourselves and our readers in Japan."

Technology said to attract Israeli trade

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Countries that once boycotted Israel now trade with her because of technological advances, not just the peace process, said a former Israeli minister of economic affairs.

China, South Korea, Indonesia, Albania, Russia and India have sent delegations to Israel in the past five years.

"Everybody thinks because of the peace process, this is happening. This is part of the picture," said Pinchas Dror at a recent media breakfast held by State of Israel Bonds.

The peace process created "a psychological atmosphere" for trade, he said, but maintained that if Israel had not been technologically advanced, those countries would still not be trading with Israel.

"We have emerged," Dror said.

Israel's GNP is greater than those of surrounding countries, with a GDP growth rate of 5.8 per cent, compared to less than one per cent in Canada.

During the last decade, Israel's GNP has increased by 75 per cent and average GNP growth has been six to eight per cent. A change in economic policies since 1985 brought about the reduction of government debt and inflation.

The Labor and Likud parties may have their differences, but their economic goals are similar, "to get government out of business," Dror noted. Two years ago Israel embarked on an aggressive privatization program, including Israeli banks.

Immigrants from the former Soviet Union have helped push Israel to the technological forefront, Dror said, pointing to the percentage of engineers in the Israeli labor force at six per cent compared to 1.3 per cent in Canada.

Dror recalled that in 1950, when the U.S. State Department thought that Israel would not last five years and Israel's GNP was less than a billion dollars, more than $15 billion was invested in Israel through State of Israel Bonds.

Israel is an extremely successful country today, he said, and the people of Israel are "very grateful for all those people who invested in us, not when it was so easy like investing today, but when it was very, very difficult and you had to have a lot of wisdom, a lot of trust in the Israeli economy to do that."

Hapoalim distributes $37 million dividends

TEL AVIV — Bank Hapoalim, Israel's largest financial institution, will distribute $37 million (US) in shareholder dividends.

Determined at a rate of nine per cent of its paid-up capital, the dividend is based on 1994 net profits of $176 million, garnered from the partial sale of shares in the $278-million energy company Delek.

Bank Hapoalim owned 29.6 per cent of the shares of Delek. It sold four per cent to the provident funds of Bank Hapoalim and to the I.D.B. Group.

Financial wiz shows lighter side

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — You'd expect a speech by one of Canada's leading securities analysts to be dry, but the only thing dry about Ira Gluskin's recent speech for the UJA was his humor.

Eighty people from the Young Business Network and Investment Divisions of the UJA gathered at the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts for an evening with Gluskin, the financial wizard known for his provacative views and irreverent humor.

Gluskin, president and co-founder of the $1-billion investment management firm Gluskin Sheff, covered a wide range of subjects including real estate, stock analysis and art patronage.

"I have an important mission," he said, "to make rich people richer." Clients invest a minimum of $1 million.

The company made headlines in 1994 when it became the sole corporate sponsor of the prestigious Barnes Exhibit held at the Art Gallery of Ontario.

The opening night party alone cost $1.5 million. Nailing the sponsorship was a coup, Gluskin said, because blue chip companies like the banks usually sponsor such events. "If you want to play in the big leagues you have to step up to the plate."

Turning to investment vehicles, Gluskin said there are mid-sized income properties generating "real solid income" in Europe and North America. "You can acquire rates of return higher than interest (rates) ... like our grandfathers did 35 years ago."

He said such income properties are yielding 11 per cent while interest rates are nine, the same spread which existed 35 years ago when income properties yielded eight per cent and interest rates were at six per cent.

Gluskin said these properties are available because the developers were destroyed by the recession. Larger real estate properties like office towers and shopping centres — "trophy properties" sought by large institutions — have a much lower rate of return, he said.

Secular Judaism won't shake up world, author Abe Arnold says

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish secularism hopes to counteract assimilation, Abraham (Abe) Arnold, author of a new book, Judaism, From the Religious to the Secular, said recently.

In his book (Robert Davies Publishing, soft cover, $23.99), the 72-year-old journalist and former Jewish civil servant makes a case for the secular Jew who casts aside the religious practices of Judaism, but not its traditions and culture.

"Secular Judaism is another form of Jewish religion without a supernatural power," he told a gathering at the Bloor JCC.

"It's an option, it won't shake up the world."

Replying to a question about secularism and assimilation, Arnold said secularism can save some Jews from going to another religion if they have become disillusioned with synagogues.

"Arnold is often far better at getting at the truth of Jewish history than professional historians," said Irving Abella, former president of the Canadian Jewish Congress, in introducing the author. "He is a great Canadian and a great Jew."

Abella credited Arnold with being the driving force in the re-creation of the Canadian Jewish Historical Society.

The author said the book is not a personal memoir of his experiences with Jewish activities in Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver and Winnipeg. He has such a book "rattling around in my computer", he said, but he has been unable to find a publisher for it.

Asked if it is possible to have a secular Jewish community without the presence of a religious community, Arnold replied, "We have both now."

He said the religious element has helped keep Jews together. "I've become more religious since I wrote the book," he noted.

The book is a scholarly compendium of myth, legend, history and custom of the Jewish people back to ancient times, with many references to how humanistic secular movements are part of that history. There are four chapters on holidays, ceremonies and celebrations.

Arnold said he is helping to organize a new group in Winnipeg for couples in a mixed marriage, "leaving out the religious trappings."

The book launch, chaired by Adam Fuerstenberg, was co-sponsored by the Jewish Book Committee of Toronto, the Secular Jewish Association, the United Jewish Peoples Order, the Canadian Jewish Historical Society and the Bloor JCC.

Jordan Merkur

An Eclectic Director: Jordan Merkur, 33-year-old artistic director and producer behind the Eclectic Theatre of Toronto, is awaiting this year's Dora Awards on June 26 with bated breath. Eclectic's 1994 production of Assassins, one of Stephen Sondheim's darkest musicals, has been nominated in no less than seven categories.

It is by no means the first time that Merkur and the 10-year-old Eclectic Theatre have garnered critical attention and acclaim. Merkur, whose production of Walking the Dead finishes this week at the Canadian Stage Upstairs in Toronto, has staged numerous plays dealing with Jewish themes, such as Chutzpah a Go- Go, a Jewish musical comedy by David Gale and Randy Vancourt that "celebrates the joys and trials of growing up Jewish in Canada."

A hit when it played in Toronto in 1993, Chutzpah is returning August 10 to the Limelight Dinner Theatre (416-482-5200).

Merkur also directed Bent, a play by Martin Sherman about the persecution of homosexuals in the Nazi death camps; it ran for four weeks in Toronto in 1992. Another of his plays was Bitter Friends, a play about Jonathan Pollard that opened at North York's Leah Posluns Theatre on Jan. 17, 1991 — the very day that the Gulf War was opening in the skies over Iraq. "Bitter Friends showed how Pollard leaked U.S. information to warn the Israelis about the build-up of arms in Iraq. It was a very timely and emotional opening, because we were all worried about the Scud missiles falling in downtown Tel-Aviv."

As well, he has committed to directing Substance of Fire, a play about the personal life of a Jewish publisher from New York, set to open at Edmonton's Phoenix Theatre in January 1996. "I think it's great that Edmonton is taking on a Jewish play, considering there's not a great Jewish population there," he says.

A former student of USDS and CHAT in Toronto, Merkur says Jewish culture has been an important lifelong influence. His sister, Shauna Tepperman, is the founder of Netivot HaTorah, a religious day school in Toronto with progressive teaching methods.

The demise of the Leah Posluns Theatre has been "very detrimental to the Jewish theatre scene," he says. "There are several celebrated Jewish artists that continue to work in theatre in this city, so it's continuing, but it's not the same."

Festival of Yiddish Culture: Billed as the world's first public event of its kind, Ashkenaz, a festival of new Yiddish culture, takes place July 4 through 9 at Harbourfront Centre in Toronto.

The festival includes works of music, theatre, modern dance, storytelling, literature, film and visual arts and crafts. Eight klezmer bands are scheduled to perform, including Brave Old World, the Klezmatics and the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band $ 4. Ashkenaz also features jazz artists Masada, Hungarian string masters Muzalkas, singer-actor Dora Wasserman, and a production of Richard Teitelbaum's multi-media opera Golem.

Most of the performances, workshops and demonstrations of Ashkenaz are free of charge. The festival is sponsored by Molson Breweries, Ontario Division, and produced in association with Harbourfront Centre with the support of various provincial and federal agencies.

Artistic director David Buchbinder, who is leader of the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, says the festival is meant to celebrate the Yiddish tradition. "We are truly excited to present an event of this scope with over 100 performers and artists from across North America and Europe."

Spanish-Jewish History: Toronto writer Erna Paris, who has written several books on Jewish themes, is coming out with a new book. Scheduled for publication this fall, The End of Days: A Story of Tolerance and Tyranny deals with two periods of Spanish history — the medieval period when Christians, Muslims and Jews lived in harmony, and the time of the Inquisition, when the Jews were expelled from the land that had been their home for centuries. A two-part documentary based on this work was recently aired on CBC Radio.

Did you know Jerzy Kosinski? Kuper Productions Ltd. of Toronto is seeking people who knew the late Polish-American writer for a one-hour documentary. If you met him casually or knew him over an extended period, please call 416-961-6609 or fax 416-961-8559.

Three faces of Yiddish life

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Three different faces of Yiddish life will be on stage at Ashkenaz, the international Yiddish festival at Harbourfront, July 4 to 9.

The most traditional is the Winnipeg Jewish Theatre's five-actor performance of The Always Prayer Shawl, by Winnipeg high school teacher Sheldon Oberman.

The inspiration for Oberman's play was a tallit given to him when his grandfather died and which he buried at the back of a drawer. Oberman did not have a bar mitzvah, but when it came time for his son, Adam, to have one, Oberman dug it out and it was around Adam's shoulders at the ceremony.

The Always Prayer Shawl, adapted from the National Jewish Book Award winning children's picture book, has been known to leave scarcely a dry eye in the house.

By contrast, God in Paris, by 40-year-old Michael Wex of Toronto, is a tragi-comedy about a fictional Polish Yiddish poet and troublemaker, Kalman Holzhacker, who does his best work in Paris just before and after World War I.

The two-man 70-minute play, featuring Wex and composer Heiko Lehmann, with guest appearances by Yiddish singers at Ashkenaz, will be presented only once, free admission, July 7 at 8:30 p.m. at the Studio Theatre, Harbourfront.

"It is an antidote to the veneration in which some European Yiddish writers of that era were held, but it is not based on the life of any single individual," Wex said.

God in Paris, though it may be irreverent in some respects, does not downplay the resilience of the Yiddish language. At one point, a character asks Holzhacker, who also writes songs for the French music halls, why a successful writer like him still writes in Yiddish.

The play provides the answer. It has been translated and will be performed in Germany in October. "There is an obsessive interest in Jews in Germany today," said Wex. "There are more klezmer bands per square inch in Germany than anywhere in the world."

Different than the two abovementioned plays is The Ivye Project, to be performed by New York dancer and choreographer Tamar Rogoff in combination with a film commemorating the Yiddish culture lost when the Jews of Ivye in Belarus (formerly in Poland) were massacred by the Nazi occupiers.

The film shows the production which Rogoff created in the woods near Ivye with a cast of 100 professionals and local residents celebrating the Yiddish culture of the day. She drew on the diary her father kept when visiting her grandfather in Ivye in 1935.

Faith and Science on the Midway by the Liz Lerman Dance Exchange is one of the acts appearing at the Ashkenaz Festival.

Jazz singer addicted to risk & change

By LEORA SCHACHTER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Take a dash of Cleo Lane, mix in some Holly Cole, add a generous amount of Charlie Parker and finish off with a sprinkling of John Coltrane — the result is a musical feast called Julie Michels.

Singing Naked, a hip new jazz recording that combines her smooth chocolate and cigarettes voice with the deeply cool sounds of bassist George Koller.

The duo is a study in contrasts — she has mounds of curly red hair which refuses to do as she says; he's bald. She skips around on stage in long, colorful dresses, clearly delighted and amazed with their growing popularity; he wears Nehru jackets and stays intensely focused on his instrument, a double bass he calls "Sandra." (That's Sawn-dra, not San-dra.)

The title of their first CD comes from the fact Michels sings without the support of a piano or guitar — she performs the musical equivalent of a high-wire act without a net. But then, the 37-year-old singer is the first to admit that she is addicted to risk and change.

"One of the signs of a dead thing is that it doesn't change," says Michels, who studied genetics in university. Seven years ago, she left her job as a corporate contract administrator and went to Europe.

Within days, she was hired on the spot in a smoky Scottish bar, to participate in the Glasgow International Jazz Festival.

Now, Canadian and European recording companies are courting Michels and Koller who are number eight on Sam's top 10 "indy" list; and Bravo Network has taped one of their concerts to air in the fall.

The only thing that will never change in her life is the importance of music. "God gave me a lover who never leaves," she says.

This month you can catch them at the DuMaurier Jazz Festival on June 23, and C'est What on June 27. For more information, you can call the Koller-Michels Hotline at 461-1793.

Books

By Bernard Baskin

An Anthropologist On Mars by Oliver Sacks, Random House of Canada $30.00

This remarkable book comprises seven case histories of various neurological illness written by the author of The Man Who Mistook His Wife for a Hat and Awakenings.

The damaged brain can produce exciting surprises, Sacks writes. "Defects, disorders, diseases, in this sense, can play a paradoxical role by bringing out latent powers, developments, evolutions, forms of life, that might never be seen, or even be imaginable, in their absence."

We meet Dr. Carl Bennett, a British Columbian surgeon with Tourette's syndrome. While the disease involves tics, twitching and jerking of limbs, when Bennett operates on his patients or flies his airplane, his hands are steady as a rock.

Sacks observed a 2½-hour operation performed by Bennett. "It was often complex — vessels to be tied, nerves to be found — but the action was confident, smooth, moving forward at its own pace, with never the slightest hint of Tourette's." The doctor's assistants who have worked with him for years are still astounded at the change in the doctor when he operates. "It's like a miracle," one of them says.

A patient simply called Virgil regains his sight after 45 years, then reverts to darkness because adapting to visual stimuli and experiences is too traumatic. "He found himself between two worlds, at home in neither — a torment from which no escape seemed possible," Sacks writes.

How is one to understand Franco Magnani, an obsessive "memory artist," who has made several thousand extraordinarily detailed paintings of the Italian village from which he had come 30 years before; or the 13-year-old autistic boy, who after a quick glance can reproduce anything with astonishing accuracy and artistic elegance?

Then there is Greg, a young man whose frontal lobe was destroyed in a bizarre accident. He was rendered blind and amnesic. A lover of rock 'n' roll music, he remembers songs from before his accident, but nothing he hears thereafter, including the concert he went to with Sacks one night.

Perhaps the most touching of the seven tales is that of Temple Grandin of Colorado. In spite of her autism, she holds a PhD in animal science, teaches at the university and runs her own business. She cannot tolerate human contact and has devised a "squeeze machine," a kind of coffin-like device attached to an industrial compressor which provides her with the solace she cannot get from humans.

"As she lies in her machine, she says, her thoughts often turn to her mother, her favorite aunt, her teachers. She feels their love for her, and hers for them. She feels that the machine opens a door into an otherwise closed emotional world and allows her, almost teaches her, to feel empathy for others."

The case studies are interwoven with the analyses of neurological causes and symptoms, and with Sacks' own development as an empathic physician. He dedicates the book "to the seven people who have trusted me, shared their lives with me, given so deeply of their own experience — and who, over the years, have become my friends."

Trip a Turkish delight!

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

CAPPADOCIA, Turkey — Mention the name Turkey and a thousand images come to mind. Verdant mountain plateaus; minaret-dotted cityscapes; serpentine coastal highways that overlook stunning turquoise seashores.

Located at the crossroads of Asia and Europe, Turkey is a country of contrasts, where ramshackle dwellings sport ultra-modern satellite dishes, and modern Volvo trucks pass shepherd girls tending herds of goats and sheep at the roadside.

A recent 13-day visit to Turkey revealed the country to be a country of stunning landscapes, charming (if primitive) villages and warm-hearted people.

The Asian part of Turkey, known as Anatolia, makes up the vast majority of the country's territory. At its heart is Cappadocia, located about 200 kilometres southeast of the capital, Ankara.

Cappadocia can be reached by flying into Kayseri, which today is a centre for the production of handmade Turkish carpets. From there you can drive to nearby Nevsehir or Urgup, either of which can serve as a base for a visit to the area.

A region unlike the rest of Turkey, Cappadocia offers an ancient landscape that bears a passing resemblance to the badlands of Alberta. But here, wind and rain have conspired to create surrealistic vistas of rock formations known as fairy chimneys.

Three million years ago, volcanoes at Mt. Erciyes and Mt. Hasan erupted and covered the region with tufa, a soft stone comprised of lava, ash and mud. Centuries of erosion have created the stunning and amusing affects seen today.

Some of the soft stone formations were easily hollowed out for use as homes, and near the towns of Urgup and Goreme, visitors can see how residents once lived in the rocks themselves. Some, like modern stone-age families, apparently still do.

For centuries, early in the common era, Cappadocia was important to the development of Christianity and the area's churches, basilicas and monastaries attract thousands of Christian pilgrims annually.

In the seventh century, when Islam began its expansion, Anatolia served as a battleground between Muslim and Christian Byzantine armies. Arab raids prompted the Christian residents to hide out in Hittite (1900-1200 BCE) and post-Hittite caves.

Today, these underground cities carved out of the soft volcanic stone stun visitors with their elaborateness and magnitude. The cave at Kaymakli is five stories deep. Its warren of chambers includes houses, smoke-blackened kitchens, wine presses and, to show that life goes on no matter what, even an underground "newlywed suite."

Leaving Cappadocia and driving west you come to Konya, home of Celadeddin Rumi, the Mevlana, a Sufi Muslim mystic who laid the foundation for the Dervish sect about 700 years ago.

The mosque that is his tomb is a pilgrimage destination for many. The dervishes are perhaps best known for their whirling dances, hence "whirling dervishes," that are used to facilitate freedom from earthly constraints and to get closer to God.

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

Situated 1,000 kilometres north of Winnipeg on the shore of Hudson Bay, Churchill, Man., is considered the Polar Bear Capital of the World. Most of the roughly 10,000 visitors who come here each year want to see the shaggy white animals that gather by the hundreds along the coast of Hudson Bay in October.

But increasing numbers of visitors are drawn in other months by the beluga whales in the Churchill River, the more than 200 species of birds that overfly the town, the aurora borealis that dances overhead, and the profusion of colorful wildflowers that carpet the tundra underfoot.

Migrating from the Pacific and Arctic Oceans, pods of hundreds of beluga whales congregate and calve from mid-July through August near the mouth of the Churchill River, where sonar-equipped tour boats enable visitors to hear as well as see them. "The beluga whale has been dubbed the sea-canary," says Lynda Gunter, owner of Frontiers North, a Winnipeg-based tour company. "They emit many high-pitched squeals and whistles, and they're obviously communicating with each other. Many people ask if the sounds can be translated, but so far we don't know what they're saying."

The whales seem just as curious about human beings as we are about them, according to Sandra Janzen, a co-owner of Fehr-Way Tours Ltd. of Winnipeg. "You can actually have eye contact with them — I've experienced that twice. It's a magical moment. They have smiles on their faces, and as they look at you they seem to be evaluating the whole human species."

Best bird-watching

Late May to early July is the ornithological season. Churchill is regarded as one of the best spots in North America to observe avian wildlife, and birders flock here from all over the world. Churchill and northern Manitoba "offers the best bird-watching in the most concentrated landscape" in North America, says Daniel Weedon, owner of Churchill Nature Tours.

Weedon points out that just as Churchill sits on the juncture of the Churchill River and Hudson Bay, the town likewise straddles three distinct biological regions. "You're standing on Arctic tundra, and you can see the great Canadian Shield boreal forest on the horizon," he says. "So with the boreal forest animals, Arctic animals and marine coast animals, you've got maximum bio-diversity."

Churchill has an equally rich cultural history, since the area was common ground for the Inuit, the Dene and the Cree. Founded more than three centuries ago as a fur-trading outpost of the Hudson Bay Company, the town still boasts such national historic sites as Fort Prince of Wales, a partially restored stone bastion built by the English in the 1700s.

"Churchill is basically a frontier town, and a lot of the business people here are fairly rugged individuals who have carved out their niche with their bare hands," says the town's mayor, Doug Webber. "We're kind of a tenacious lot."

Whales, wildflowers & walks

Equally tenacious are the tundra's various species of moss, lichen and miniature shrubs and flowers that burst into a dazzling array of reds, violets and yellows in July and August. Along with the flora and fauna, or probably because of it, there is a startling profusion of tour operators in and around Churchill. For most of them, their busiest time is polar bear season in October. Tour operators contend that visitors who come to Churchill for the polars bears alone miss the loveliness of summer and may have to endure blistery weather that all but confines them to a tundra buggy. In summer, they say, you get the whales, the wildflowers, and all the tundra walks you want.

"If you're a wildlife enthusiast, you know about the polar bears of Churchill because of the special that National Geographic did about 10 years ago," says Frontiers North's Lynda Gunter. "The beluga whales have not yet gotten that kind of coverage. A lot of people just don't know about them, and that's why they don't sell as quickly."

Inaccessible by road, Churchill is an hour and a half by jet from Winnipeg, and about 36 hours — two nights and one full day — away by train. Via Rail's train service is invariably popular, and many tourists wish to experience the overland trek to Churchill in at least one direction. "Many people feel that travelling by train is one of the last great frontier things to do, because it is a fact that the train service is diminishing," says Gunter.

According to Doug Webber, Churchill advertises itself as the farthest south accessible arctic tundra in the world. Tours to Churchill, including airfare from Winnipeg, start at about $1,800: that's all it takes to make the inaccessible accessible. Greeting and Blessing!

In response to the notification of the forthcoming marriage of a group of Russian Jewish couples, "in accordance with the Law of Moshe and yisroel," I hereby send my heartfelt greeting and blessing of Mazal Tov Mazal Tov. May this undertaking be crowned with great success in all aspects.

The current year תש"נ , which has been designated as a year of Nissim (miracles), adds a further meaning to the message relating to the event. In Loshon HaKodesh, the word Nes (miracle) also means a flagpole, or banner, which is used as an effective means of rallying people together for a common purpose. And, of course, the common purpose of all Jews is to make this world a fitting "dwelling place" for HaShem - in our heart and mind, in our home, and in the world at large.

I am confident that all the participating couples will make their home a fitting "dwelling place" for HaShem, and that this happy event will be a source of lasting inspiration stimulating continuous advancement in all matters of Yiddishkeit, Torah and Mitzvos, not only to the participating couples, but also to the entire Jewish community.

With prayerful wishes for Hatzlocho in all above, and with blessing of Mazal Tov

PRIME MINISTER · PREMIER MINISTRE

I am pleased to extend my very best wishes to the Jewish Russian Community Centre of Greater Toronto on the occasion of its 4th annual Gala Wedding.

It is indeed the "Happiest Day of the Year" when husbands and wives have the opportunity to renew their matrimonial vows according to sacred religious traditions. The joining of a number of expectant couples under the chuppah for a traditional Jewish wedding will surely mark an important milestone in their lives.

My compliments to the organizers of this truly special event. Through its efforts to maintain the vibrancy of Jewish Russian culture in Toronto, the Jewish Russian Community Centre of Greater Toronto is doing its part to further Canada's multicultural tradition; a tradition that has given our national life a distinctive flavour rarely found elsewhere. Their work benefits not only the Russian Jewish community, but all Canadians.

I wish each of the happy couples all the best as they begin anew their lives together under the Laws of the Torah.

Greetings and Best Wishes!
Fourth Gala Wedding
June 13, 1995

I'm delighted to extend warm greetings to everyone taking part in the joy of this day. I'm also delighted to have the opportunity, here in this supplement to The Canadian Jewish News, to congratulate the Jewish Russian Community Centre of Greater Toronto for its many activities and programs. By strengthening your community, you are making Ontario stronger.

I wish every happiness to the couples being married. The ceremony today celebrates the sacred venture of marriage, as well as the richness of your heritage which is rooted so deeply in human history. But the "Happiest Day of the Year" has profound significance not only for the Jewish Russian community here in our province. It also has great meaning for people of all backgrounds and beliefs who cherish the freedom of religion and work hard to protect it as a fundamental part of a free and democratic society.

Please accept my best wishes on this special and memorable occasion.

A Message from Mayor Mel Lastman

Best wishes and congratulations to all of our newlywed couples as our Jewish Russian Community Centre of Greater Toronto brings you together for the "Happiest Day of the Year".

It is most appropriate to have such a blissful ceremony taking place in The City With Heart. Finally, our brides and grooms are receiving the Jewish wedding ceremony that they always dreamed of having.

For all of you, this is your second marriage -- to the same person! Following your individual ceremonies in Russia, you can now rejoice in a second celebration that reflects your Jewish roots and heritage.

Given the importance of this occasion, I'm the Happiest Mayor of the Year.

Cordially,

Mel Lastman

CONGRATULATIONS

Occasion of

"The Happiest Day of the Year"

As Mayor of the City of Vaughan, and on behalf of the Members of Council, I am pleased to extend the congratulations of the entire Vaughan Community to the happy couples who will be remarried in this traditional Jewish ceremony.

I am particularly pleased that I had the opportunity to be present at the Gala Wedding last year. Due to previously scheduled commitments, I am not able to join with you in celebrating the "Happiest Day of the Year".

My very best personal wishes to the happy couples and their families as they reaffirm their connection to their Jewish heritage through this beautiful religious ceremony.

Yours truly,

Lorna D. Jackson

Thank You To All

I hope you will enjoy reading this Supplement as much as we have enjoyed putting it together.

It is dedicated to the Gala Wedding sponsored by the Jewish Russian Community Centre of greater Toronto.

It was only through the efforts and determination of our dedicated committee that we could have accomplished such an impressive task.

Let me begin by saying thank you to Vera Gilenko, Advertising Manager, Mendelevich Ben Dat, Editor of the Canadian Jewish News and their staff for their guidance, patience and interest in helping us realize our goals.

Thank you to our dedicated committee:

Kenny Bodnarenko
Hanan Green
Yakov Kanel
Yitzhak Kleppisch
Ian Shumeiko
Boris Zhitnitzky

in helping to bring this Supplement to the attention of the many Sponsors and Advertisers.

Thank you to the many Sponsors and Advertisers who, through their donations, helped bring the wonderful stories and photos of the past and present for every one of us to enjoy.

Thank you Chanoch Weinberg for your sensitivity that is so well accomplished in all the pages of the Supplement.

My special thanks to Rabbi Yeoash Zuberman, our spiritual leader at the Jewish Russian Community Centre of Toronto and Yaacov Ben, the dynamic marriage director who kept the fire burning under us all to help bring this wonderful paper to life.

Finally
With my best wishes,

Historical Backdrop

The year 1917 brought the Russian Revolution.

At the forefront of the revolution were many Jews who rejoiced at the downfall of the long dreaded monarchy and the hated Czars.

Millions of Russian citizens began to breathe freely.

Among them were thousands of Jews who after the gloom of centuries of oppression now suddenly caught their first glimpse of liberty as equal citizens.

But the euphoria of the victory of the "February revolution" which marked freedom was shortlived as it was replaced by the "October revolution" whose essence was dictatorship.

The Vilna Gaon's Seventy Year Prophecy 1920 — 1990

The Vilna Gaon, one of the greatest Talmudic masters and mystics of modern times, in his commentary to the Zohar writes that the entire duration of galut, exile, is likened to a pregnancy. Exile serves as a preparation for Messianic times when there will be a rebirth and new life for the Jews and for all mankind.

Just as in a pregnancy, the last stages just directly prior to the birth are the most painful, similarly, the last stage of exile is the most painful. Particularly, writes the Vilna Gaon, the last seventy years of Galut are the most trying.

The difficulty of this stage of galut is alluded to in the twentieth chapter of Psalms when King David prayed, "G-d should answer you in a time of distress." In this chapter there are nine verses which parallel the nine months of pregnancy. There are also exactly seventy words in this chapter, alluding to the final seventy years of galut, which will be the most traumatic.

In 1990, the doors of the Soviet Union were finally flung open and all Jews were permitted to emigrate without any restrictions. As well, Jews in the Soviet Union were given absolute freedom to practise Judaism to the fullest without any limitations or interference.

This amazing prophecy of the Vilna Gaon was fulfilled before our very eyes. From 1920 until 1990, the Jews of Russia experienced the harshest forms of galut, imprisonment and torture with all their rights as Jews withheld, unable to practise Judaism in any shape or form.

Indeed, the Lubavitcher Rebbe proclaimed in 1990 that the period of exile had come to a close and we were henceforth entering a new period, a period of preparation for the Geulah, the ultimate Redemption.

Congratulations to the JRC for all its wonderful work on behalf of Toronto's Russian Jewry

Rostov, USSR
Purim 1920

The year 1920 was one of the most difficult years for the Jews in Russia. After the Bolshevik communists seized control of Russia, they began to tighten their iron hand with the utmost ferocity. With the help of the ruthless Yevsektsia, they began to hound Jews and Judaism with a fanatical ferocity. They persecuted observant Jews, closed the religious schools and synagogues, exiled and executed leading rabbinic and lay persons, confiscated religious artifacts and made it almost impossible to adhere to a halachically acceptable lifestyle. Jewish celebrations were strictly forbidden.

In this atmosphere the fifth Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Sholom Dovber Schneersohn announced that his Chassidim should no longer pay visits to him for yechidut, private meetings, or to hear Chassidic discourses due to the very real danger.

Nevertheless, on Purim of 1920, the word spread that there would be a brief farbrengen, Chassidic gathering, and afterwards all participants should immediately disperse so as not to arouse the suspicion of the Bolsheviks who had forbade any Jewish gatherings and in particular those at which there would be alcoholic drinks.

After a short while into the farbrengen, all those who were present, noticed a complete change in the countenance of Rabbi Sholom Dovber Schneersohn. The Rebbe instructed all his Chassidim to remain and he requested that more spirits be brought.

The Rebbe's son, Rabbi Yosef Yitzchak, was very frightened that the gathering would be discovered. His father calmed him saying, "Don't be afraid. We will remain complete!"

Later during the farbrengen, the Chassidim were informed that the Bolsheviks were conducting a door to door search. Terror gripped them. When the Rebbe was made aware of the grave situation, however, to everyone's amazement, he only increased the singing and joy.

The Bolsheviks finally pounded on the Rebbe's door. The Rebbe instructed his Chassidim not to hide anything, but to leave the vodka as well as a large pile of money which had been collected that evening to support the Yeshiva on the table, in the open. (Raising money at this time was strictly forbidden as the communists suspected that the money would be used to fund revolutionary forces.)

As the Bolsheviks entered the Rebbe's court, the Rebbe exclaimed, "I have absolutely no fear of them. We will start to talk words of Chassidut and they will become totally nullified."

The Rebbe began to deliver a deep Chassidic discourse explaining the essence of evil and how evil is not true reality.

The Bolsheviks just stood, transfixed and staring at the Rebbe's holy face. After the discourse, they simply left, without uttering a word. The Chassidim were stupefied with the outcome. Less than a month later, on Nissan 2, the Rebbe, Rabbi Sholom Ber Schneersohn passed away. Before departing from this world though, the Rebbe had made sure to sow the seeds of the eventual collapse of the evil empire which would occur seventy years later.

A FEARLESS LEADER

To the Bolsheviks, religion was characterized as superstitious and cant.

The Jewish section of the communist party, known as Yevsektsia, were virulently anti-Jewish Jews and ruthless and fanatical in their treatment of their fellow Jews.

They planned and executed countrywide destruction upon the people and the Torah of Israel.

It was during these dark days, when Jewry was going through its severest trials that Divine Providence provided the oppressed thousands with a fearless leader—Rabbi Yosef Yitzchak Schneersohn, the sixth Lubavitcher Rebbe.

Seeing the anguish of his brethren as the cherished bastions of prayer, study and charity were ruthlessly crushed, here arose a leader of stature who stood up to fight his people's enemies.

THE INTIMIDATING TOY

Rabbi Yosef Yitzchok of Lubavitch writes:

In the summer of 5680 (1920), I was summoned to the Tcheka [which later became the GPU, then the NKVD and, finally, the KGB] of Rostov-on-the-Don. The summons was carried out by the Judaism-hating "Jewish section" of the Communist Party, the infamous Yevsektsia.

The summons was typical of the manner of the Tcheka. I had not yet concluded the morning prayers (I was leading the prayers myself, for it was within the year of mourning after my holy father's passing) when the three emissaries from the "court of death" entered the room. They were dressed in their uniforms of red and black, rifles in hand, their belts crammed with bullets, a pair of revolvers and a pair of Cossack knives, with helmets of copper and faces aflame. They approached me and said: "You are summoned to immediately accompany us to the offices of the Tcheka."

Two of the messengers were from the Yevsektsia and the third a non-Jew. The two Jews wished to strip me of my tallit, prayer shawl, and tefillin, phylacteries, on the spot. When I told them that I must first finish my prayers and the Torah study which follows, they let loose a barrage of curses and yelled at me to remove my tallit and tefillin immediately. (Incidentally, one of them was a refugee from the city of Shavel who had once come to me for assistance. I had arranged a position for him at a cigarette factory and later I had loaned him money to establish a business of his own. For the next three years—up until the revolution—he earned a respectable living.) Were it not for the intervention of their non-Jewish colleague, they would have forcefully interrupted my prayers.

When I finished reciting the final blessing after the Torah study, I went along with my armed guardians. One walked on my right, a second on my left and a third behind me, in the manner that those accused of treason against the regime are led.

When we arrived at the "courtyard of death," they led me to a large chamber in which some fifteen people sat along both sides of a long table. At the head of the table sat another two, and I was seated opposite them at the foot of the table. My three guards sat behind me, left, right and center.

One of those seated at the head of the table addressed me: "We are the members of the Party's Committee to investigate Religions, now occupied in investigating the Jewish religion. We have various questions. We have already summoned Rabbi Berman and Rabbi Goldenberg—we asked what we asked and they answered what they answered. We have now summoned Rabbi Schneersohn to resolve certain issues pertaining to Kabbalah and Chassidism."

All this was said in the Russian language:

I answered in Yiddish: "I have already made it clear on the two former occasions on which I was summoned to the Tcheka that I will not budge from my principles. There is yet to be born, and never will there be born, the man or demon who will move me in the slightest degree from my principles..."

Before I finished my words I was interrupted by a "committee member" seated on the right side of the table. He lifted the revolver which lay on the table—in addition to the arms which they all wore on their belts, a revolver lay on the table before each of the assembled—and pointed it at me, saying: "This toy does away with 'principles.' Fear of it has opened many a mouth; also the dumb have become talkative before it."

"You are utterly mistaken," I replied. "This toy impresses only the cowardly atheist, who has but a single world and many gods—every hedonist has his many gods. But as for us, who have but a single G-d and who believe in two worlds, the toy which you are brandishing not only fails to frighten, it makes no impression whatsoever."

AN ARMY OF DEVOTED FOLLOWERS

There is no area of Jewish life that Rabbi Y. Y. Schneersohn did not toil to rebuild and fortify.

Here was a leader who headed a small army of followers for whom fire and water were meaningless in the face of a command, or even a hint from his lips.

Here was a leader who dared to curb the seething volcano of atheism that threatened to erase all remaining vestiges of Torah life.

Clockwise from top:
R. Mendel Futerfass at a Chassidic gathering.
R. Avrom Leeb Slavin, 14 year old Henich Rapoport.
R. Simchas Gorodetsky helping Israeli youth don Tefillin.
R. Hillel Liberov, and a group of Chassidim at a farbrengen (Chassidic gathering)

A Response to an Unwritten Letter

Reb Mendel Futerfas, a devoted soldier of the previous Rebbe, Rabbi Y. Y. Schneersohn and after his passing a chassid of his successor, Rabbi M. M. Schneersohn, suffered greatly during his incarceration in Siberia. One day in 1953, when he felt he could no longer endure the torment, he was reminded of something he had once heard from the older Chassidim—that it was possible to turn to the Rebbe for help in one's thoughts, no matter what the physical distance may be between them.

Picturing the Rebbe, Rabbi M. M. Schneersohn, in his mind, Reb Mendel imagined himself standing before him, reading aloud his request in which he poured out his heart.

Meanwhile, Reb Mendel's wife who had left Russia in 1946 as a Polish citizen and had settled in London with her children was unaware of her husband's conditions in Russia, or if he was even alive for that matter. One day, she received a letter addressed to her husband from the Rebbe in which the Rebbe acknowledged receipt of Reb Mendel's letter and promised him that he would soon be released. Excited to receive an affirmation that her husband was indeed alive, Reb Mendel's wife immediately called the Rebbe's secretary to verify that her husband had truly written the Rebbe. The Rebbe, however, declined to answer Reb Mendel's wife.

Soon after this incident, Reb Mendel's situation began to improve. A short time later he was released from the labour camp and even allowed to leave the Soviet Union.

When he arrived in London in 1962 to be reunited with his family he was surprised to be shown this letter waiting for him from the Rebbe. The letter contained an answer to his letter of such and such a date.

Red Mendel did not understand, for he had sent no such correspondence to the Rebbe; as a prisoner, he had never been permitted to do so.

When he studied the date, however, he realized that the Rebbe was answering in writing to the request that he had sent him in thoughts.

Memories of My Life in the Soviet Union

From 1960 to 1971

An Interview with Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman of the JRC

Maintaining a proper Jewish lifestyle in the Russia of old was no easy task. Any small observance which nowadays is taken for granted became a formidable challenge.

As a child in Moscow, I learned in a secret Cheder, Jewish school. Every week, the location of the school was changed so as to minimize its chance of discovery. Every Saturday night it was the job of a different student to transfer the Jewish texts on a bicycle to the new location with the hope that there was less chance of the authorities suspecting a young boy.

Since classes in the government schools were conducted six days a week including Shabbat, Saturdays, those children attending these schools had to contrive a weekly plan to free them from Saturday's attendance. Sometimes the parents would bribe a doctor to write a note that the child was of particularly frail constituency and therefore required two days of rest a week. If there was a sibling in the family, another excuse needed to be invented to avoid his attendance as well.

I remember a Saturday when my father was required to appear at work. He would leave our home before the crack of dawn and walk for many hours until he would arrive at work. To avoid signing anything on Shabbat, he would tie his hand in a handkerchief claiming that it was badly bruised, cut or burnt. We would eagerly wait for him for Kiddush and the Shabbat meal until late in the afternoon when he finally found the opportunity to slip out and walk back the long distance.

Even something as simple as affixing a mezuzah, a small piece of parchment on the doorpost, became a cumbersome obstacle. To affix a mezuzah on the gate of our home would be too noticeable, and hence, dangerous. Therefore, late one night, we stole out of our home heading to the gate. Armed with a carpenter's tool, my father carefully carved out a space the exact dimension of the mezuzah. After placing the parchment in its new home, and reciting the appropriate blessing, the mezuzah was once again covered up with a piece of matching wood. No one could discern the mezuzah hiding underneath; only we felt its enveloping protection as we passed daily by the gate of our house.

Holidays were especially a time fraught with danger, but also joy in the realization that we outsmarted the KGB in upholding the Torah and our traditions. I remember collaborating with my mother on how we would explain the night-long lively dancing and celebration at home on Simchat Torah, the festival of the rejoicing of the Torah, to the neighbours. Each holiday would have its own excuse: father's birthday, a get-together with friends or a child's party. We almost needed an elaborate accounting system just to keep a record of all the "birthdays" to ensure that they occurred on the same date of the Russian calendar each year!

Before Pesach, Passover, our grandfather's home became a full-fledged matzah bakery. Well before Chanukah the preparations began as I would accompany my father to the farm carrying clean sacks and a sickle to gather and cut the wheat. The wheat would remain hidden in our attic until it was time to grind and bake it with all the restrictions strictly according to Jewish law.

Our contact with the Lubavitcher Rebbe in New York gave us much courage and inspiration, but needed to be conducted through utmost secrecy. We would write via relatives in Israel asking them to ask "uncle" or "grandfather" advice on this or that matter. The relatives would write back quoting what "uncle"—the Rebbe—answered.

On one occasion, due to the urgency of the matter, my father dared to send a telegram directly to a relative in New York. He informed the Rebbe that my mother was pregnant and that for health reasons the doctor advised her to abort. At this time I was 10 years, and the only son, with four sisters. Very little time passed before we anxiously received a telegram from New York promising the healthy delivery of a child. Shortly after, my brother Boruch, who now lives in Toronto serving as the principle of Cheder Chabad, was born.

In July 1971 my family was miraculously granted permission to leave the Soviet Union and emigrate to Israel. With great anticipation, shortly after our emigration, my father and I travelled to New York, following which I started to study in the Rabbinical College of America in Morristown, New Jersey.

THE STORY OF REB YECHIEL MICHL RAPOPORT

A Chassid and the Son of a Chassid

On the Sunday before Pesach, three KGB officers arrested me a second time and dragged me off to their headquarters in Cuthais, Georgia. My charges for my first imprisonment were being a "Schneersohnist," helping other Schneersohnists followers, having studied in a Schneersohnist yeshivah and teaching Schneersohnist teachings.

On the third day of my interrogation, I was sent from Cuthais to Leningrad, my first stop being Baku. I was brought to my next stop, the Rostov prison, on Friday, the eve of Pesach. I was tormented by hunger. I spent Chol HaMoed Pesach in the Kharkov prison until I was finally transferred to Leningrad. Locked in prison there, I had ample free time to ponder over the torture and self-sacrifice that had been the lot of the previous Lubavitcher Rebbe, R. Yosef Yitzchak, when he had been imprisoned and interrogated and held under capital sentence in this very same prison. In the decades that had elapsed since 1927, however, the building had been renovated considerably.

I was treated in that prison as if I were the most dangerous criminal imaginable. Firstly, despite my experience in forced labour camps, I had shown that I was slow in learning the desired lesson. My special treatment, over and above that meted out to the other inmates, was expressed in: solitary confinement; being escorted to interrogation sessions by two armed guards instead of one; being denied all reading matter and the privilege of a daily airing in the courtyard, no matter how heavy the security precautions might be; and so on. Even my tough interrogator was an officer of impressive seniority: I was interrogated by no less a personage than the Deputy-Director of the Interrogation Department himself.

The daily routine in a Soviet prison has been described more than once: rising at six, and remaining awake at all costs for the remining seventeen hours until eleven, this order being enforced by brutal punishment.

This is the routine that I made for myself. First of all, I recited the morning prayers at a very leisurely pace. I then recited chapters of Tehillim, choosing from among the 130 that I knew by heart. Like all the other chassidim who had followed the instruction of the Rebbe, I had also committed to memory the first twelve chapters of Tanya, as well as the introduction. And, of course, I was also able to study those chapters of Mishnah that I knew by heart. As I walked up and down my cell, my lips would be constantly muttering these passages. When I grew tired from my daily stroll I would sit down for a moment's rest, but would immediately fall asleep. The warder who stomped up and down the corridor had his ways and means of seeing to it that this rest should not last more than a moment, so I would then resume my stroll—first from wall to wall, then from corner to corner, then from wall to wall, and so on.

On more than one occasion I was visited by the prison's psychiatrist, who made touching attempts at engaging me in conversation. His aim was to evaluate the extent of my sanity, for, as had been reported, "This prisoner talks to himself for hours on end every day."

At eleven at night the prisoners were ordered to lie down to sleep. It goes without saying that after the kind of day that we experienced, we would fall into a heavy slumber the very moment we were allowed to lie down. Only twenty minutes later, however, we were roused by the raucous voice of the warder, who would open each peephole and shout: "Is there a prisoner here whose name starts with an A (or B or whatever)?" In each case, of course, the prisoner inside would have to quickly wake up and answer either Yes or No. Even though the warder knew my name, for example, he would nevertheless wake me and ask me if my name started with a B. When I answered that it did not, he would go on his way. Twenty minutes later he would be back to wake me again with a new question: Did my name start with D? Receiving an honest answer, he would again go away, only to return as many times as it took him to reach the letter R.

On one such occasion I answered affirmatively, and added, as I was supposed to, that my name was Rapoport. He returned only ten minutes later, and barked: "Get dressed!"

From rich and unforgettable experience I knew exactly what this portended. And, sure enough, two soldiers appeared within minutes to escort me through the gloom of the dank and freezing stone corridors to the interrogator's chamber. Each session would typically last a few hours, and at four or five I would be ushered back to my cell. Exhausted, and my head in a whirl, I would then try to salvage a precious hour or so of sleep, for very soon it would be six o'clock, which meant neither lying down nor sitting, neither leaning, nor trying to snooze while standing.

This was my daily routine throughout most of the summer months. There were few nights indeed that I was not summoned for a mid-night cross-examination, and that I was able to sleep like a normal human being.

As my investigation proceeded, I realized that by and large the questions followed a chronological order: my schooling, my parents' occupation at that time, the dates of my starting and completing yeshivah studies, and so on. This knowledge enabled me to prepare answers to the questions that I expected for each successive stage of my life. When the interrogator reached the stage of my first arrest and imprisonment, I gathered that this recurring nightmare was about to come to an end. And, indeed, from that time on I had two full consecutive weeks of uninterrupted sleep every night.

Then without any warning, I was again woken up rudely one midnight, and ordered to get dressed. This time I was terrified, not knowing what could have suddenly aroused those Angels of Death from their welcome stupor.

Thrust into the familiar hell-chamber, I found that now for the first time I was confronted by three interrogators instead of the one I had had to cope with hitherto. I knew full well that this guaranteed two things—weighty charges, and a gruelling cross-examination. With one interrogator, one at least has a chance of concentrating more or less, and producing a considered reply. When there is a troika, one finds that the instant one has delivered one's answer to the first questioner, the second pounces on one with his prepared query. This is barely answered somehow, and the third carnivore attacks his prey.

They started from the beginning all over again: place of birth, names of parents; their genealogy; and so on. Finally, finally, my cross-examination came to an end. No, one thing remained. They handed me a list of allegations as follows:

"The accused is a Schneersonski Chassid, who obeys and executes the rulings of his sect; he is a traitor to his country, and has been convicted of forging documents.

"Evidence to the above: The accused contravened the law by attempting to flee from his homeland by means of forged documents. This episode constitutes treason.

"The accused transferred moneys from Leningrad to Lemberg for the support of a Talmud Torah in which children studied underground. This offense was committed under orders from Yonah Cohen, one of the leaders of the Chassidic sect.

"As to whether the accused is a Chassid, and the son of a Chassid, this is beyond all doubt, and requires no proof whatever."

For all of these charges I was then sentenced to ten-years' imprisonment in the forced labour camps of the far north, under Sections 58/10-11 and 58-1-S of the law of the land. For good measure, my file was labeled, "Keep forever," which meant that even after the sentence had been served, the charges were always on file and at hand.

R. Yechiel Michl Rapoport miraculously survived and eventually emigrated from the Soviet Union to Israel where he taught Torah to young emigrants from the USSR.

A few short hours after relating the above memoirs, however, R. Yechiel Michl Rapoport returned his valiant, noble soul to his Maker. It is therefore doubly appropriate to append here the words with which he himself brought his life-story to a close:

"I often say, just by way of a joke, that when after 120 years I arrive in the World of Truth, and someone in the Heavenly Court says, "What kind of a Chassid are you? After all..., and so on," —then I'll tell that angel that he should please take the trouble to find his way to KGB headquarters in Leningrad, and to open File No. 23, Year 1951; for there it is stated, and forever, that I am a Chassid, and the son of a Chassid, and that I was imprisoned for it too."

THE AUTHORITIES' SCHNEERSOHNSKI POLICY

The authorities knew full well the extent and power of Rabbi Schneersohn's challenge.

Accordingly, they conscripted all the sophisticated resources and brute strength at their command to the silencing of this arch defier and his emissaries.

Their policy was enumerated clearly enough: whenever they succeeded in laying hands on any "Schneersohnski" he could expect either death or imprisonment and flogging, cross examination under torture and exile to a forced labour camp in frozen Siberia for as many decades as it took for him to waste away and perish.

A SON'S MEMORIES

An Interview with Yitzchak Rapoport, son of Reb Yechiel Michl Rapoport and Board Member of the JRC

Politburo member Zhdanov who died in 1948;
a police photo of Stalin taken in 1900;
politburo member A. S. Shcherbakov, a virulent anti-Semite who died in 1945, (in 1953, during the Doctors' Plot trial both Shcherbakov's and Zhdanov's deaths were attributed to Jewish doctors in the Kremlin, in truth, they died either of alcoholism or by order of Stalin);
a typical NKVD building;
politburo member V. V. Kuibyshev (during the purges of the thirties his death was attributed to two Kremlin doctors, Levin and Pletnev. Levin, a Jew, was executed.)

My father was imprisoned when I was half a year old. His "criminal" offense was in the language of the KGB, "Schneersonski," namely, a Lubavitcher Chassid. After severe beatings in jail (he had broken ribs; I remember once in Israel after having an X-ray done on his chest because of pneumonia, a doctor in the hospital called the staff to see what they had rarely seen) he was sentenced to ten years of hard labour in Siberian labour camps.

With my mother I was more "fortunate." She was taken to prison when I was one and a half years old and sentenced as well to ten years in Siberia for "committing the same crimes against the state." She actually was "fortunate" as she was involved in financing and preparing false papers for many Chassidim in 1946 to enable them to leave Russia as Polish immigrants. If she had been caught for this crime her sentence could have been twenty five years in prison. She had a Polish passport for herself but gave it to a friend as she was "in more need for it" according to my mother, but that's a story in it's own right.

I remained with my grandfather, who was single at the time as my grandmother passed away during the blockade of former Leningrad by the Germans. My grandfather looked after me until about nine years later when my parents were released from prison with the death of Stalin. Till today I remember my grandfather's routine schedule. His day would begin early in the morning when he went to the mikva (ritual bathhouse) and, in later years, when the mikva did not function, he immersed himself in the ice of the nearby river, always mocked by a group of sailors. His preparation for prayer took a very long time, after which he studied the rest of the morning until the late afternoon prayers. He then took a short nap on the hard bench and after an hour or two would continue studying Torah until the evening prayers. His working day would start after the evening prayers. He earned his meagre income by repairing watches which he did very deftly. Even the local police would come to him for his services despite the fact that he spoke a very poor Russian. His working day ended late at night and at sun rise he was again on his feet.

He also spent some time teaching me alepb-bet, prayers and Torah. When the time came for me to go to school the only choice at the time was of course public school, which he flatly refused even upon pressure from the local authorities (apparently his working relationships with the police paid off). After two years, the threat of loosing his grandchild to the orphanage forced him to send me to school. However, he insisted and was successful that I not attend classes on Shabbat and Holidays.

The real pressure from the authorities began once my parents returned from prison. First was my mother, and she was called to the director as soon as she arrived. She played "dumb" insisting that she had just returned from prison, was living with her father and had little influence in the matter. To the question of where is the father, my Zaidy answered in his broken Russian to the effect that there is no father.

For a while this worked as I had excellent marks and there was more pity than anger about a good kid from a broken home and a domineering fanatical grandfather. As soon as my father returned, however, and it became known that there is a father, all anger poured out at once. The local newspapers ran articles (which my mother keeps to this day) about "spiritual child abuse" in "our midst" and how poor Isaac (my Russian name) is forced to study some outdated fanatical texts instead of playing soccer after school like all children. It all ended with a public trial at which my parents were fined and given an ultimatum to send me to school on Shabbat or be imprisoned again, while I would end up in an orphanage.

At this point we had little choice and I began to attend school on Shabbat, although it was the beginning of fifth grade and I was old enough to be instructed by my father on how to behave under the circumstances according to Jewish law. This continued for a year during which I very often "had accidents" with my right hand from "playing basketball" or "knife requiring hobbies" which somehow mostly happened on Friday, requiring tight bandages which prevented me from writing on Shabbat. Since the school only knew about the resistance to attend on Shabbat, nothing much was suspected and everything soon came to a relative calm.

At that point my parents decided to look for a more permanent solution to the problem. Fortunately, they had a doctor friend who was able and willing to help. Her plan was quite simple: find an illness that is either chronic or difficult to diagnose and she would look after my treatment. Such an illness was quickly found and I began grade six as a chronic "bed wetter," requiring therapy twice a week, a short session every Tuesday evening and a long session every Saturday. Every Saturday of my school life from there on was spent in the clinic where our friend was the director of the pediatric division. I was treated with hot sand bags, ultraviolet baths and other Russian medical state-of-the-art treatments to help cure me of "my problem."

This was the type of life we led in the former Soviet Union.

FAITH IN THE CORRIDORS OF FEAR

The Story of Rabbi Yoseph Yitzchak Schneersohn's experience in Soviet Prison in 1927

In the middle of the night agents of the Jewish section of the Communist Party (Yevsektsia) had burst into the Rebbe's house, conducted an exhaustive search and terrorized the household. They then arrested the Rebbe, stating that he would be taken to prison for just a short period to be questioned, but the Rebbe and his family understood the great peril. The following is an excerpt from a direct translation of the Rebbe's personal journal of the events, translated by Rabbi A. Bentzion Metzger.

We arrived at Spalerno Prison. Nachmanson and Lulov (two Jews of the Yevsektsia who arrested the Rebbe) instructed our guards to carefully watch the "honoured citizens," me and my fellow passenger (another prisoner who was being transported in the same vehicle as the Rebbe), as they hurried to the door guard. My fellow passenger is consumed with fear, he is white as snow, and is trembling. The soldier guarding him is watching him with "seven eyes," a Javelin in his right hand and rifle in his left.

I observe my fellow passenger's clothing, they are of a European cut, his fashionable attire is perfect, his costume complete down to the white silk gloves, but his face is frightening to look at and he seems about to pass out.

"Stand!" we are commanded. "Get off the wagon, honoured citizens!" The guards form a double line from the wagon to the door for us to pass through.

My neighbour gets off first as he is closer to the door and I don't rush to get up. I now realize that he is a foreigner as he doesn't understand the language and must be directed with hand motions.

After he is shown in, Nachmanson signals to Lulov, who turns to me and he says with glee. "Now take the trouble to walk, and I will take your bag whether you agree or not. Now you are our guest and you must obey our instructions."

"Yes, a great victory on your part, but I hope it will be for a short time only." I answer calmly and confidently.

"No speaking," one of the armed guards calls out. It seems he can't control his hate for Jews, especially one who is held in high esteem by religious Jews.

Nachmanson walked before me, two armed guards at my side and Lulov behind. Nachmanson walked quickly but had to stop to wait for me as I walked very slowly stopping every now and then to rest, as my legs were in pain.

"What about your promise to let me put on Tefillin and pray?" I asked Nachmanson. Nachmanson turned, his face livid, "Before you even walk through the door to fulfill the obligations required of you, you already make such demands?! It seems you don't want to recognize the reality of your situation or learn the rules of the prison. First you will be brought to the administrative office where you will answer all the questions on your form, then you will be brought to your cell where you will be allowed to pray. I think, however, that very soon you will become wise to the reality of your situation and you will forget all these foolish requests. Forget that you are a "Schneersohn," the honoured one amongst "those who pray to G-d," in fact you are an ordinary person who is being punished by incarceration or perhaps other penalties in accordance with your crimes. You have committed more than enough crimes against the working class, and now you will pay for them all."

I didn't respond, I only gave him a piercing look which had a greater effect on him than any response that I might have made.

"What do you think?" Said Nachmanson turning to Lulov. "When this 'Honoured Citizen,' that for decades has been enjoying the cream and fat of the Bourgeois, will come to our new 'pavilion,' to the Spalerno 'salon,' won't he enjoy the black bread and grits 'delicacies.' There he will leave his arrogance behind. There at the table he will speak, there he will offer information, there he will answer questions," and turning to me, "not so Honoured Citizen?!"

"What about your promise?" I said to Nachmanson, ignoring his comment to Lulov, "you promised me on your word as an officer of the G.P.U. that you would allow me to put on tefillin to pray. Why didn't you tell me at my home that you would not allow me to?! Of whom were your afraid?! Why did you give me your word?! Is this how an officer of the G.P.U. behaves?!"

A victorious smirk played on Nachmanson's face, a smile telling of the revenge he was enjoying. At that moment I realized that here was an officer of the G.P.U. whose task was, first and foremost, to throw fear into the prisoners and bring them to a state of confusion, fright and trembling which would make it easier to control them and extract any desired "confession."

I remembered a passage in Reisbit Chocbmab which describes two groups of demons at the gates of Hell calling "Come!...Come!..."

They handed me over to a guard who led me to a corridor and pointing to a large doorway at it's end, he told me to go through that door and approach one of the secretaries who would give me a form on which all questions must be answered.

The corridor was about 30 yards long by 7 feet wide, lined on both sides by locked doors. Small lights hung from the ceiling at every 15 feet and there were ten or twelve armed soldiers along its length at regular intervals.

Each of these guards was armed with a cassock javelin hanging across his back; in his left hand he held a gleaming sword and in his right, a rifle. They stood as still as stone statues; only their eyes followed my movements.

This unusual and frightening scene was meant to instill dread in any human heart.

A normal person would not understand the need for all these arms. For whom do they need all these tools of destruction? Where do they find these degenerates who would make use of all these weapons? Is it possible that a person would be such a beast to enforce his ways by resorting to such violence.

The deathly quiet, gloomy darkness, black walls and small lights, the "statues of destruction" with their strong, tall physique, broad shoulders, chiselled features, black and red uniforms, and ornaments: the javelin, sword and rifle, all create an image that overwhelm the eyes and terrorize the heart.

Questions raced through my mind as I slowly walked the corridor: Where is all this leading? For what purpose? What should I do? How will it all end...

I turned to enter the room that Nachmanson described as the room where everyone talks whether by will or by force.

I stepped across the threshold and gazed into a room approximately 18 feet square. Along three walls of the room there sat about 20 women, most of them writing and smoking. They faced the centre of the room, and on the other side of their tables stood the benches where the "guests" were brought to sit.

It was a strange sight. There were approximately forty people in the room: the twenty secretaries writing on long forms, and the twenty prisoners answering their questions either willingly or because of the force of circumstances. Nevertheless, silence prevailed. The questions and answers were exchanged in a very quiet manner. Only the scratching of the pens on the sheets could be heard...

"Sit citizen," said the stenographer. "Here is a sheet of questions. Answer each question clearly in the place designated."

"I have nothing to write," I replied. "This does not relate to me and I have nothing to answer."

"What?" inquired the secretary. "You do not wish to conform to the official procedure? It is an established law that each individual arriving here must fill out this answer sheet and clearly respond to all the questions."

"I did not come here to visit of my own free will, but was brought here. The persons who brought me are fully cognizant of my identity. What reason is there for me to do something that is utterly superfluous?"

"Do you forget where you are? Is your mind confused? Do you intend to institute new procedures in this department? What is your name?"

THE THREAT TO THE REBBE'S LIFE

Even the saintly Rebbe wasn't spared from the torturer's abuse.

In the summer of 1927, at midnight of the 15th of Sivan, the Rebbe was arrested and placed in solitary confinement in the notorious fortress of the Spalerno prison of Leningrad.

The Rebbe's life was now in imminent danger, as a death sentence had already been passed.

Due to the pressures of prominent foreign statesmen, however, just in the nick of time, the Rebbe's life was spared and he was released from his incarceration on his birthday, the 12th of Tammuz.

Further intercession resulted in his release from Russia.

"I am very much cognizant of the fact that I am a prisoner brought to Spalerno and my mind is in good order. Nor do I seek to institute new procedure. My name is Schneersohn. I live on 22 Machovaya Street, Apartment 12. I will not write any answers on the questionnaire. And you can enter the information given."

The secretary took the form entered the fact given and then continued, "What is your vocation?"

"I am involved in studies, the study of the knowledge of G-dliness known as Chassidut, and the study of Jewish Law and its observance in accordance with the Jewish religion."

"Religion! G-dly knowledge!"

"Yes! The knowledge of G-dliness. One G-d has created and formed all existence, and His Divine providence extends over all creations. The crawling creature in the sea and the small creatures in a desert wasteland, and mankind in civilized society."

"How can I possibly write such answers on the questionnaire?"

"Who compels you to write? As far as I am concerned, you need write nothing. If you desire to write, do so, and if not so inclined, then don't write."

Suddenly three men appeared at the threshold of the second room and gazed into this room. Their eyes searched the room... and upon noticing me, the expression upon their faces indicated that they had found what they sought. Their entrance cast a cold fear throughout the entire room. Though the guards in the centre of the room and the secretaries made no overt sound or movement, a definite change of atmosphere could be sensed in the room...

The secretary complained to the official who had approached the table. "I am unable to fill out this citizens' questionnaire since he does not provide any responses. He asserts that this is completely unrelated to him and he refuses to answer anything but his name, address and family title."

The official took the form, scrutinizing it for a few moments, and then turned to me, "You have not answered any of the questions in this form. You must fill it out completely. There is no other alternative." He spoke in a completely calm manner, like an administrator scrutinizing a report.

I responded, "I wish to take this opportunity to clarify whether the assurances of those authorized by your agency, or more precisely, the representatives of your agency, are trustworthy and if one may rely that their assurances too will be observed meticulously."

The official replied, "I do not understand what you are saying citizen."

"A representative of this agency who came to arrest me tonight assured me that I would be permitted to observe the Tefillin ritual and to pray. It is already an hour and a half that I am here and his word has not been kept. He told me on his own initiative that I would be here merely for a matter of hours and that upon my arrival, a number of high officials would ask me a few questions and then permit me to return home.

"I do not know his motive for saying this to me. I do not know if his motive was solely to calm the members of my household or whether it was his malicious intent to perpetrate this lie consciously. Frankly, I am totally unconcerned about his motive. I am a religious Jew. I desire to put on my Tefillin and pray...

"As to the questionnaire, I have already stated that I did not come here of my own free will, but was brought here by the emissaries of the G.P.U. I am certain that those who arrested me as well as the high administrative officials are aware of my identity.

"All I have to state is as follows: I am Rabbi Schneersohn, son of the famed Rabbi Schneersohn of Lubavitch. I bear the hereditary title of 'a citizen honoured for generations.' My birthplace is Lubavitch; I learned there in the Yeshiva and I subsequently lived for eight and a half years in Rostov and three years in Leningrad. My primary preoccupation is religious study. I am involved in the discipline of reflection upon G-dliness known as Chassidut and also concern myself with clarifying the laws and statutes of the Jewish people. I, like all other religious Jews have no link with politics. I have nothing else to state."

The firm answer, the clear response and my cold composure were all "natural vessels for that which transcends nature," and the official, as though reflectively talking to himself said, "What is written is adequate." He turned to the secretary and with light laughter, but with burning eyes, said, "Write as the citizen states."

Directing my question to the official, I asked, "And what of my Prayers?" He answered in a vain self-assertive manner, "You will receive an answer from the prison administrator of the division where you will be escorted for confinement." He stalked off restraining his rage.

The secretary took a new form and wrote my statement with great care and handed it to me for my signature.

The marble pavilion built to enclose the house where Stalin was born in Gori, site of the last remaining statue for Stalin in the Soviet Union.
Stalin became Lenin's protégé around 1911 and upon his request wrote an essay on the "nationalities question" which expressed an early antipathy toward Jews, this famous photo of Stalin and Lenin was supposedly taken at Gorky during Lenin's final illness.
Stalin's mother, Ekaterina did washing and baked bread in the homes of the rich (his father was a shoemaker)

I took the questionnaire and read it carefully. I drew a line through all the response places of the remaining questions to clearly indicate that these question were unanswered. After I had completed reading it, I signed the paper...

"Yes everything is in order," mumbled the secretary to herself as she glanced over the questionnaire, "very little was written but these words mean much." And as a look of pity crossed her face, she whispered to me, "perhaps you would like to send a message to your family, tell me and I'll find a way to let them know as soon as I get home after work."

I did not reply at all. The secretary gathered all the documents and told me to follow her.

"I must tell you that they are preparing very serious charges against you. I know that they have gathered much evidence against you. I know now who you are. They intend to punish you severely and the situation is very serious."

We climbed from ladder to ladder as she spoke. My feelings alternated between fleeting moments when it appeared to me that her words were lies intended to frighten me and then for brief instants to the impression that she spoke the truth. Who knew, perhaps there existed even within this secretary a small measure of human feeling. I will not deny that there were a few intensively difficult moments. My thoughts blurred, my heart pounded very rapidly, my knees buckled and an inner tremor passed through my entire body.

Miraculously, while a death sentence hung over the Rebbe's head, intense efforts on his behalf finally resulted in the Rebbe's release from prison on the twelfth day of Tammuz after suffering immeasurably for nineteen days in the notorious Spalerna fortress. Further intercession resulted in the Rebbe's emigration from Russia.

ON THE SHORES OF AMERICA

In leaving the boundaries of the Soviet Union, Rabbi Yosef Yitzchak Schneersohn left his emissaries and their infrastructure of Jewish life behind.

These selfless activities continued to function and thrive, preserving and even spreading the teachings of Torah even after his passing, under the leadership of his successor, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, up until this very day.

Upon arriving in New York, Rabbi Y. Y. Schneersohn took on a no less formidable challenge: the frigid spiritual atmosphere of the western world.

From his wheelchair he rallied the Jewish young of America with the slogan that "America is no different"—that the timeless truths of Torah can take root and flourish even in America.

The Doctor's Plot and Stalin's Deportation Plan

"Arrest the Murderous Doctors," screamed the Pravda banner headline on January 13, 1953.

"Kremlin doctors, mostly Jewish, murdered top Soviet leaders and plotted against others, perhaps even Stalin himself," said the article.

A front-page editorial, entitled "Miserable Spies and Assassins under a Mask of Physicians," read:

"State security agents exposed terrorist doctors who murdered Soviet public figures through medical treatment. The accused...belonged to the international Jewish bourgeois nationalist Zionist spying organization... Documentary evidence, investigations, and confessions by the arrested have established that the criminals sabotaged their patients and doomed them by IMPROPER treatment...

"These monsters trampled on the sacred banner of medicine. This gang of anthropoid animals planned to eliminate the leaders of the armed forces and weaken Russian defenses."

The doctors were arrested and tortured to confess their "crimes." Russian historian Anton Antonov-Ovseyenko reported "The neuro-pathologist Grinshtein bore himself bravely.

"Grinshtein, a powerful man, was tortured by electric shock, savagely beaten, and his face mutilated. He was cruelly starved, losing 63 kilograms from his original weight of 100 kilograms. (Later, when he was released, he could not walk, and had to climb up the stairs to his home on his hands and feet.)"

For six weeks, the story of the traitorous Jewish doctors proliferated throughout Soviet society.

Stalin's widely publicized "doctors' plot" whipped up anti-Semitic hysteria to distract the rabble from other social concerns. The dragon's teeth had produced a rich harvest.

The frequent stories triggered a witch-hunt against "Zionist poisoners and spies." Every Jewish doctor, nurse and pharmacist was vulnerable. In Tashkent, a Jewish doctor was accused of trying to murder a baby. People believed that Jewish doctors injected their patients with cancer-causing agents, or syphilis. A story spread that a Jewish doctor had made a dog out of a boy. In the Ukraine, twenty doctors arrested were called "child murderers." Two hundred Jews were dismissed from Odessa University and all Jewish graduates of medical schools were sent to remote areas in Siberia.

Stalin's plan called for the doctors to be found guilty and sentenced to death in late March or early April. They would be hanged in Red Square on a circular stone platform next to the one Kremlin used in medieval times for executions.

Attacks on Jews would be orchestrated by the secret police. Jews would be shipped to camps east of the Urals. Jewish leaders at all levels would be set to spy on each other. The KGB would start killing the Jewish elite. Then the stage would be set to "get rid of the rest" in gulag labour camps and eventually the "Jewish problem" would disappear by attrition.

Meanwhile in Brooklyn: "Hurrah, Hurrah, Hurrah!"

It was in the year 5713 (1953), just over three years after the passing of Rabbi Yoseph Yitzchak Schneersohn and the appointment of Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneersohn as the leader of Chabad. With the approach of each Jewish holiday the Rebbe was accustomed to publish pamphlets that contained unpublished writings of the previous Rebbe.

On the 21st of Teves (January 8), the Rebbe suddenly ordered the publication of a new pamphlet that contained an article by the previous Rebbe, beginning with the words, "G-d does not overburden his creation." The Chassidim were deeply puzzled by this surprise request.

In the main body of the article, the previous Rebbe wrote about the situation of the Jewish people in exile. He spoke of the ability of the Jewish people to withstand all the difficulties of exile even when it required the utmost sacrifice. "As it is our fate to experience the bitterness of exile," the article stated, "we certainly have the power to overcome the difficulties. Otherwise, G-d would not have decreed it."

Five days later, on January 13, 1953, one of the most frightening events of our generation began to unfold—"the Doctors' Plot." It deeply affected Jews behind the Iron Curtain during the darkest days of Stalin's rule. It began when the state-controlled media announced that a plot had been fomented by a group of "terrorist doctors," most of whom belonged to an "international Jewish organization." These doctors, the media reported, had plotted to assassinate many high ranking officers in the Russian Army and had already succeeded in killing two of them: Drs. Kortzchov and Zadnov. The arrest of all the doctors connected with the plot and their imminent trial was announced.

Most of the Russian intelligentsia, especially the Jewish doctors, knew that the report was a total fabrication. They understood that it was one more skirmish in the all-out war Stalin was waging against the Jews, but the announcement was enough to trigger anti-Semitic feelings far and wide. The riff-raff on the street didn't need any more encouragement to give vent to their darkest passions.

Propaganda in the Soviet media became stronger and stronger each day, and anti-Semitic incidents increased. Everyone waited with bated breath for the day of the show trial against the Jewish doctors. No one had any doubt that they would be found guilty and then the real threat to the Jews would begin. Jews throughout the Soviet Union were thrown into a state of confusion. Fearing for their lives, they were afraid to venture out into the streets; whenever they did, they were greeted with a barrage of insults and physical threats.

During those dark days, many knowledgeable Chassidim began to talk about a possible connection between the surprising action taken by the Rebbe and the terrible event transpiring far away on the other side of the Iron Curtain. The publication, after all, had come just five days before the announcement on the Russian radio. Perhaps the Rebbe had anticipated the crisis.

A few months later, during the Purim gathering by the Rebbe, the mood was mixed, a combination of the joy of Purim and worry over the fate of Soviet Jewry. One always feels pain for other Jews who are suffering; and in addition, many Chassidim had family who still lived in the Soviet Union, which filled them with even greater apprehension.

At the Purim gathering, the Rebbe spoke words of Torah for many hours. Suddenly, he paused and appeared to withdraw into himself. Suddenly, the Rebbe's face began to light up and he related a story:

"It happened when the Czar was overthrown...elections were held. The Chassidim received instructions from the Rebbe, Rabbi Sholom Ber to participate in these elections. There was one devoted Chassid who was removed from worldly matters and knew nothing about politics. But inspired by the opportunity to fulfill the Rebbe's will, the Chassid went to the voting booths. Not knowing what to do, he just followed what other people did."

The Rebbe's face seemed to be on fire.

"And so, after voting, when it became clear that the Czar had been overthrown, he heard people shouting 'hurrah!' "

Now the Rebbe's face seemed to be in a state of total ecstacy.

"And so this Chassid also shouted, 'Hu-rah! Hu-rah! Hu-rah!' "

The Chassidim were shocked at this amazing story, then slowly its meaning began to dawn on them. Gradually, they joined in the Rebbe's chant and within seconds all the people in the synagogue were shouting, "Hurrah, hurrah, hurrah!"

Three days after Purim, on the 17th of Adar 5713 (March 4, 1953), Soviet radio made a dramatic announcement that shocked the entire country: two days earlier, late at night (at precisely the time that the Rebbe was delivering his discourse), Stalin became very sick and lost consciousness. The official announcement was made the next morning: Stalin was dead.

The sudden death of the tyrant resulted in the freeing of the Jewish doctors and made way for a new and somewhat easier life for the Jews of the Soviet Union. Many Jewish prisoners were freed, and Jew-baiting, both official and on the street, subsided.

In retrospect, people recalled the unusual chant, "Hurrah, hurrah," which would mean in Hebrew, "Hoo Rah—he is evil, he is evil!"

DESTINED FOR GREATNESS

A LESSON IN TREE CLIMBING

A few days before Pesach 5662 (Passover 1902), on Friday the 11th day of Nissan, in the city of Nikolayev, Russia, a son was born to Rabbi Levi Yitzchak Schneerson and his wife Chana. At the brit, circumcision, on Pesach, the baby was named Menachem Mendel after his great-grandfather, the third Rebbe of the Chabad dynasty of Grand Rabbis.

On the day the baby was born, Rabbi Sholom Dovber, the fifth Rebbe of the Chabad dynasty, sent no less than six telegrams with detailed instructions regarding the upbringing of the infant. According to these instructions, his mother was to ritually wash the baby's hands before he ate; she even washed his hands before nursing him. Indeed, he never ate in his life without first ritually washing his hands.

When he was only two year old, Menachem Mendel was already asking the four questions at the Seder. At two and a half, he knew how to pray like an adult.

At the age of three, as was customary in those days, he was sent to study in a cheder, Jewish school. Once, his mother came to visit him in cheder during recess. All the other children were trying without success to climb one of the trees that stood in the playground, but her son succeeded in climbing the tree in a few short minutes. "How did you manage that, Mendel?" asked his mother. "They look down, so they are afraid of falling, but I look up so I am not afraid," the little boy answered.

Indeed for the rest of his life, he was always to look up and was therefore never afraid of the most daunting challenges.

A QUIET ACT OF COURAGE

One day when young Menachem Mendel was taking a walk with his mother on the banks of the Dnieper River, the weather suddenly changed and a raging storm came up over the river. His mother noticed a four year old boy surrounded by an excited crowd. The child was soaked to the bone. The boy's mother was emotionally telling the people around her what had happened:

"My son fell into the water, and he was drowning, but at the last moment an older boy, about nine years old, jumped into the river and pulled him out!"

Only then did Rebbetzin Chana notice that her Menachem Mendel was not at her side. She was filled with fear until, a few moments later, her son appeared, soaking wet—without saying a word.

Growing up in the days of the short-lived Russian Revolution of 1905, was a time filled with pogroms when attacks against Jews were common. One day, when Menachem Mendel Schneersohn was four and a half, wild gentiles fell upon the Jews of Nikolayev, threatening their lives. The Jews escaped to various hiding places to wait until the danger passed. Menachem Mendel and his parents were hiding with other families with small children, but the children were making such a racket with their screaming and crying that they were all in danger of being discovered.

What did little Menachem Mendel, who was keenly aware of the danger, do? He went around to all the little children, gave this one a candy, that one a pat on the cheek, another words of love and encouragement, and succeeded in distracting them until the danger had passed.

DEVOTED "SOLDIERS"

Upon Rabbi Yosef Yitzchak Schneersohn's passing in 1950, his son-in-law, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneersohn assumed leadership, building upon and expanding on his predecessors work causing a global renaissance of Jewish life.

Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneersohn raised an entire generation of devoted "soldiers" in a war on ignorance and assimilation..

By sending his emissaries to virtually every corner of the globe where Jews are to be found, from communist Russia to a remote city in Africa, he restored to thousands of Jews their identity and heritage.

A Call from Afar

Almost thirty years ago, the Hasofer family, a product of the far-left Hashomer Hatzair kibbutz movement, had left Israel and settled in Tasmania, an island off the southern coast of Australia. The Hasofers were entirely secular, almost totally ignorant of Judaism, and they were not likely to meet other Jews in such a far-off place. Concerned that they would lose their connection to Israel, the family decided that they would learn several chapters of the Tanach, Bible, together every day. One result of their study was that Mrs. Hasofer, a psychologist by profession, began to perceive that every generation throughout history has had one unique individual who serves as leader of the entire Jewish people, be it Moshe, Moses; Yehoshua, Joshua; the Judges etc. From their study it was also obvious that this leader was endowed with special powers. Mrs. Hasofer began to wonder: was it possible that an individual like this existed in our generation as well?

One evening, during a particularly stressful time in their lives, Mrs. Hasofer was sitting by herself at home. Addressing the empty room she said, "If I am right, and there is a leader of the Jewish people today, and this leader can hear me because of his spiritual powers, I hereby ask that he help me become closer to Judaism." These words, uttered in an emotional state, were quickly forgotten, and the Hasofer family carried on with their daily lives and routines.

One day, three weeks later, Mrs. Hasofer noticed a Jew dressed in rabbinical-looking garb walking down the street—not exactly the most common sight in Tasmania. When she learned that he had just arrived from Melbourne, Mrs. Hasofer immediately invited the rabbi home and asked him to be their house guest. The next few days were filled with questions, as the family made good use of this opportunity to acquaint themselves with Jewish concepts. They even began to take upon themselves the observance of several practical mitzvos. The Hasofers' progress was so fast, in fact, that they soon decided to move to Melbourne in order to live in a more Jewish environment.

Who was this Jew who appeared out of the blue and ultimately led an entire family to do their heritage? It was none other that Rabbi Chaim Gutnick of Melbourne, Australia. What was he doing in Tasmania in the first place? As the Hasofers found out later, Rabbi Gutnick had received an urgent letter from the Rebbe, directing him to go to Tasmania. A Chassid does not ask questions but obeys immediately, and so, Rabbi Gutnick had hopped aboard the next plane. Mrs. Hasofer did not believe his story until he showed her the actual letter from the Rebbe. It was then that she understood that the Rebbe had heard her plea, made 19,000 miles away on the other side of the world, and sent Rabbi Gutnick to help!

Even One Hour!

Related by Rabbi Yisrael Haber, director of the Chabad house in Crispin, Ramat HaGolan

In 1980 during my days as a chaplain in the United States Army, I was sent to Alabama. On the way, my wife, Miriam and I stopped off in New York and merited a private audience with the Rebbe.

During the audience, the Rebbe asked me to go to Alaska (where I had once served as Chaplain in the army) and strengthen the spiritual needs of the Jews there. "How long should I remain there?" I asked the Rebbe. "Even one hour," he replied. I wondered, what could I possibly accomplish in one hour in Alaska.

When we left the Rebbe's office, we told our friends waiting outside what the Rebbe had said. We expressed our astonishment at the Rebbe's request that we travel to the end of the world "even for one hour." What could we do there in one hour, I asked my wife. And what was the meaning of the words "even one hour"?

We set out for Alabama, and on the Friday after we arrived there—during the time of year when the days were very long—on the Rebbe's orders, I took a special flight to Alaska, planning to spend Shabbat there. As soon as I arrived, I checked out various communal affairs and found that everything was in order.

On Sunday, about an hour before my flight home, two brothers who had recently arrived in Alaska came to meet with me. They told me that about six months earlier, their father had died and they were unable to recite Kaddish for him since there was no minyan in Alaska. They had heard that an Orthodox Jew had, by chance arrived that Friday and they had hurriedly come to meet me to discuss what they could do.

It was exactly one hour before my flight. I made a few telephone calls to friends and talked them into coming to form a minyan for the two brothers. I succeeded in convincing another friend to hold daily prayers in his home for the entire year. It took about an hour to complete all the arrangements.

I caught my return flight to New York at the last minute and arrived at the Lubavitch headquarters just as the Rebbe emerged from his small shul. I thought about the Rebbe's words, "even one hour," and the fact that in one hour I had succeeded in organizing a regular minyan at the end of the world. The Rebbe flashed a fatherly smile full of meaning in my direction.

The "Alaskan" minyan continues to function until this very day, all in the merit of "one hour."

THE JEWISH RUSSIAN COMMUNITY CENTRE OF GREATER TORONTO (JRC)

THE FOUNDING OF THE JEWISH RUSSIAN COMMUNITY CENTRE

In 1981, following a request by Rabbi Z. A. Grossbaum from Chabad Lubavitch of Ontario, Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman was sent by the Lubavitcher Rebbe to Toronto to act as spiritual leader of the growing Jewish Russian Community. This program was initially sponsored by Chabad Lubavitch. His mission was to help the large Russian Jewish population settling in Toronto to discover the depth and meaning of their religion.

The JRC, which was incorporated in 1985, would serve as the address for the Russian community's every need, be it physical or spiritual.

From a modest beginning in 1985, the JRC has become a major factor in the lives of thousands of individuals and families. More than 25,000 Russian Jews reside in the Greater Toronto area. Most are involved in the programs and services provided by the JRC and receive its monthly Russian publication, Exodus, and English publication, Shofar.

Numerous ongoing educational programs are carried out under the leadership of Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, who is assisted by three Russian speaking Rabbis. The following pages include some of the activities which take place throughout the year.

WE NEVER LOOK BACK ON THAT PLACE WITH NOSTALGIA

An interview with Iosef Braverman

My wife and I are looking forward to two occasions in mid-June 1995. They are my fiftieth birthday and our Chuppa. We will celebrate the first with a few friends at home. For the other celebration hundreds of Jews in our community will get together to wish my wife and me Mazal Tov and make the Chuppa the Happiest Day of the Year. I want everybody to know that I highly appreciate this. I'll tell you why.

There have always been ethnic tensions between the Kazakh people, the Russians and the Jews in Karaganda, Kazakhstan, a republic in the former Soviet Union. The powers barred our people from practicing their religion. The synagogue was closed. Anti-semitism instigated by the powers increased with every passing year. The Jews started emigrating. By the time we left the country you couldn't really speak of Karaganda Jews as a community.

In 1987 there was a fire in the laboratory where our daughter worked, due to the criminal negligence of the bosses. Our daughter got very badly burned in the fire. But instead of helping us to get adequate treatment for her, the bosses, in order to escape persecution, demanded that we should not tell anybody about what had caused her injuries. They even threatened us with death. We knew the danger was quite real.

"Clear out!" The anti-semites would say. "Move out and leave us alone!"

We listened and we emigrated to Canada. And I never look back on our place in the former Soviet Union with nostalgia.

In Canada I am at last one of a community of Jews. Here, in Toronto, religion keeps us together. I see how well organized the life of the Russian-Jewish community is. I know it well, as my daughter worked as a volunteer in the JRC. It is simply a wonder how Rabbi Zaltzman finds the time to speak to each of us, to find out what is going on in every family, to give advice and help, if necessary. It was he who asked us if we would like to participate in the Gala Chuppa 1995. It goes without saying that we agreed at once, and with gratitude, too. And Mazel Tov to the other participants of the Chuppa!

EDUCATING OUR YOUTH: THE JRC TALMUD TORAH & DAYCARE PROGRAMS

One of the first areas of Jewish education that Russian Jews are receptive to, lies with the children– the generation of tomorrow.

Exposure to our beautiful tradition is vital for these immigrant children.

The children carry their learning and Jewish pride back to the adults of the household, inspiring them to rediscover the path of our ancestors.

The JRC Talmud Torah and full time Daycare programs offer a wonderful opportunity for children, from Russian speaking families, to learn about our Jewish heritage in an atmosphere of warmth and enthusiasm. Both the Daycare and the Talmud Torah have been established in response to the many requests from parents because only a tiny fraction of Jewish Russian youth had received even a semblance of Jewish education in the former USSR. Hands on learning is emphasized in the study of Jewish laws and traditions as students actively participate in a range of Mitzvot and holiday awareness programs. Social programs and activities help strengthen our children's friendship with their Jewish friends and their warm relationships with the staff of the JRC. Our teachers, all trained professionals with years of experience, emphasize a warm relationship with their students and effective communication between school and home.

IT ALL STARTED WITH THE CHUPPA

In 1993, a week after we arrived in Canada, I started attending the Saturday services in the JRC's synagogue. Among the numerous children of all ages who came to the synagogue with their parents was a boy of twelve or thirteen whose name was Yonathan Khalimsky. He was surprisingly good natured and even-tempered. I never saw him fighting with other boys and it was clear that he enjoyed the respect of the other kids. Whenever we met, he always shook my hand, and I saw that he never missed the services in the synagogue.

I was also surprised to notice that every now and then on Saturday, he would be called to the bima to be the chazan for about one hundred adults. In fact, one Saturday morning, a friend of mine, a very religious man about 70 failed to understand a certain passage in the Torah reading. "Ask the Rabbi," I advised. "It's alright," he answered. "I'll ask that little guy, Yonathan Khalimsky. He knows everything."

Yonathan's mother, Rachel Khalimsky explains, "Our children, Yonathan and Dina do give us a feeling of pride and satisfaction. When I try to trace it back, to the time it all started, I feel convinced that the only explanation to the naches, joy we get from our two children is the fact that we started our married life with a Chuppa which took place in Israel.

"It was then that we received G-d's special blessing which directs our lives daily. There was no doubt in our minds to which school to send our children when the time came. Later on, when our children were already students in Jewish schools, they encouraged us to observe more mitzvot. Today as we look back twenty or so years to the former Soviet Union, when we were unable to even dream about our Jewish traditions and education, we see the tremendous changes that took place in our lives.

"We feel happy and sure that our children will continue in the footsteps of our great-grandparents. It certainly gives us a feeling of accomplishment, of filling the gap between several generations. Our present lifestyle, with the support of the JRC, helps us keep the family together."

TO RISE TO THE OCCASION

An Interview with Alex Dukhovny

We know that there is going to be a Gala Chuppa in June this year. We wish the newlyweds all the best and wholeheartedly say Mazal Tov.

It is common knowledge that in the former Soviet Union all religious life was suppressed. Thus my grandparents were sent to prison merely for their religious activities. Such government policy could not but yield results. I saw with bitterness that the younger generation in that country became less and less observant or altogether G-dless.

Here in Canada I am trying my best to make up for that moral damage. And my priority is my children.

We have lived in Canada since 1990. Both our children were born in the Soviet Union. My son is twelve years old. Six months ago he had a brit, circumcision. In February 1995 we redeemed our first-born; every Sunday he attends Orah classes at the Associated Hebrew School and he reads the Torah. He seems to understand the importance of all this. My daughter is only seven but she can read Hebrew; on Shabbat and Jewish holidays she and her mother light candles, and so on and so forth. My wife and I attend the weekly Sunday classes, The King's Table, at the JRC. We do hope that our children will acquire the high moral principles which the Torah contains and will be guided in their lives by those principles.

When the time comes, G-d willing, we will see our son's Bar Mitzvah and our own children's Chuppahs.

TOUCHING LIVES: THE JRC SYNAGOGUE PROGRAMS & ADULT EDUCATION

Thousands of new Russian immigrants were arriving, free at last! Their long awaited exit visas allowed them unheard of freedoms and a new future.

But what awaited them in Canada? Who would help them spiritually in their new home?

After seven decades of struggling to keep their Yiddishkeit alive, these Jews hungered for self-esteem and an understanding of their rich heritage.

And they came to the JRC for help.

A MESSAGE FROM RABBI YOSEPH ZALTZMAN

Rabbi & Executive Director of the JRC

The purpose of the JRC is to bring the growing Jewish Russian community of over 25,000 individuals back to their Jewish roots. We spread the light of Yiddishkeit through a variety of educational programs which cater to all ages, from children to seniors. Our programs revolve around the Jewish calendar and special Jewish holiday events and are intended to meet the full range of individual and family needs. As our sages tell us, "The one who saves a single soul, is considered as one who saved an entire world."

At the JRC we have the opportunity to help thousands of souls rediscover their Jewish heritage. It is very exciting to experience this awakening of Yiddishkeit in so many individuals.

JRC YOUTH PROGRAMMING

The JRC offers programs specifically tailored to the needs of youth going through the difficult teen years. These fun, stimulating programs include trips to New York, group Shabbatons, touring local attractions, informal discussion groups community service and a whole variety of interesting activities to meet many interests. The JRC Youth program nurtures each participant's sense of Jewish identity and commitment.

SENIORS PROGRAM (Kollel Tiferes Z'kenim Levi Yitzchok)

Seniors begin each day with Shacharit (morning prayers), followed by breakfast and study. Each member of the Kollel is provided with a modest stipend for his efforts and in turn enjoys a stimulating spiritual, physical and social environment as well as a feeling of accomplishment as his Torah knowledge grows.

CLASSES AND LECTURES

The JRC provides a variety of classes and lectures on a wide array of topics to meet every interest and level of education. Subjects include Torah, Talmud, Jewish Law, Jewish Mysticism and Kabbalah, Jewish Holidays and Customs, Chassidic philosophy and much more, altogether totalling over 650 classes a year!

COMMUNITY SYNAGOGUE

The JRC in addition to being a place to meet and learn, offers daily minyonim, including both an early and late Shacharit minyon, Mincha at sunset, followed by a short class and then Maariv. At the popular Shabbat minyon, the JRC's sanctuary is filled to capacity. The shul remains open throughout the day for people to drop by to learn, to merely sit in a Jewish environment and talk, or to get a taste of Yiddishkeit.

CIRCUMCISION OF ALL AGES. In the former Soviet Union, Jewish males were not permitted to have a Brit, circumcision. However, for these Jews now living freely in Canada, the starting point of their relationship to their Jewish heritage is often a Brit. Since the JRC opened, we have performed over 1400 Brit Milah for men of all ages, from 8 days young to 60 years. At times, the JRC even performs a Brit on both a father and son, or two brothers on the same day.

WOMEN'S GROUP. Several women in the Jewish Russian Community offer a wonderful service delivering cakes, candles and Shir Hamaalot cards to new mothers; organizing classes and planning special holiday activities and Rosh Chodesh gatherings for women. This group has come to play a vital role in the growing Jewish Russian Community.

THE JRC MITZVAH CAMPAIGN

Mezuzah Campaign. To date over 5,000 kosher Mezuzot have found a home on door posts of homes and offices. Despite the fact that this mitzvah was relatively unknown in the Jewish Russian Community, hundreds of families currently phone during the year to request mezuzot be a part of their new home.

Bar/Bat Mitzvah. The JRC provides boys and girls reaching Bar/Bat Mitzvah age with the training and the educational tools to enable them to fully appreciate this important milestone in their lives.

Kashrut & Shabbat. The JRC has been instrumental in koshering many homes, dispensing Shabbat candles, providing important Jewish books and encouraging Russian Jews to give Tzedakah daily through the provision of Tzedakah boxes.

Tefillin Campaign. Through the efforts of the JRC Rabbis, men who were formerly totally unaware of any Jewish traditions are now putting Tefillin on regularly.

The Jewish Russian Community Centre of Greater Toronto provides Funeral, Kaddish & Yahrzeit Services.

The Jewish Russian Community Centre is the address for Russian Jewry at all times of need.
During a time of grief and sorrow, such as with the death of a loved one, the Jewish Russian Community Centre provides direction and assistance in organizing a funeral, shiva, kaddish or unveiling.
Yahrzeit letters are mailed to encourage individuals to commemorate the dates of passing of their loved ones.
Year long kaddish services are provided during the first year for those individuals who require them.
Currently, over 5,000 yahrzeit letters are sent out annually.

THE HAPPIEST DAY OF THE YEAR: THE JRC GALA WEDDING

A natural progression of the JRC's successful educational programs was an increased awareness and renewed pride in Jewish traditions, fostered in the hearts of the Russians immigrants.

They thirsted to experience Jewish practices which could not be observed in the past, in a totalitarian regime which tried to alienate them from G-d and from the beauty of Torah. They thirsted to begin their lives afresh, to start over according to Halacha, Jewish Law.

Many couples, although married by civil ceremony in the former Soviet Union, wished for the opportunity to reaffirm their connection to their Jewish heritage by remarrying according to the Laws of the Torah.

The JRC provides this opportunity by conducting a multiple couple Gala Wedding, coined appropriately, The Happiest Day of the Year.

Just say the word "wedding" and you're likely to elicit whimsical memories and bring nostalgic smiles to faces. Pictures of joyous dancing, lively music and happy celebration immediately crowd the mind. Multiply the merriment by several and you're likely to find yourself at the JRC Gala Wedding!

It's with good reason that this special event has been coined "The Happiest Day of the Year." While every wedding is a special occasion, the JRC Gala Wedding is unique both in its quantity and its content. On Tuesday, June 13, 1995, several Russian couples will be married according to Jewish Law for their very first time. Though many of these couples have been civilly married for years, it is only now that they will receive a proper Chuppa and Kiddushin.

Up until recent years, Jews in Russia had been prevented from practicing religion freely and, as a result, many have been distanced from Judaism to the point that they have been robbed of the basic right to a Jewish wedding. Now through the educational efforts of the JRC, many Russian couples are feeling the need to rediscover their roots and their heritage. For some Russian couples , this means going back in time and literally starting all over again—with a proper Jewish wedding.

The JRC, which has been at the forefront of educating Russian Jews and bringing them closer to Torah and Mitzvot has sponsored three such Gala Weddings since 1990. On the Happiest Day of the Year, several Russian couples will become newlyweds for the second time—but this time in an everlasting, eternal Torah way. Indeed, for these couples, Tuesday, June 13, 1995 will mark their "Happiest Day of the Year." Make it yours too!

WE ARE LEARNING FROM OUR GRANDCHILDREN

An Interview with Pavel Malinov

I was born in 1925 in Kremenchug, a town in the Ukraine, the USSR, on the River Dnieper. The 1931 Dnieper flood carried away all our religious books. There were no Hebrew schools or yeshivas there, so I learned but very little about Judaism. Then, in 1941, the war started. My two brothers perished at the front in the first months of the war. I was demobilized from the army only in 1947. Since our house in Kremenchug was destroyed during the war, I settled in Kharkov. A few years later I married Berta. Soon our son was born.

We had no Chuppa. All religious life in the Soviet Union was suppressed. One of the two fine buildings that once had been synagogues was used as a gym; the other, which was said to be the largest synagogue in Europe was turned into a planetarium...My wife and I did remember at least something about Jewishness, our children knew nothing.

Valerie Malinov

But we always looked forward to it.

Time flies...

In 1992, Berta and I emigrated to Canada where our son and his family had lived since 1990. That was where our return to our Jewish roots started.

We frequented the synagogue. At the JRC library we borrowed the Torah in the Russian translation and read it very attentively from beginning to end. We are in a great hurry to make up for what we had missed. And who do you think helps us to learn? You'll never guess—it is our grandson Valery. We are learning from him.

He has missed nothing.

It was already here, in Toronto, that he had a brit, circumcision, at the age of three. Now he is eight years old. He is a student of the Associated Hebrew School. He helps us to learn. Valery often comes over and starts his class: "Granny, say 'Baruch ato.' Grandad, what do we do on Erev Rosh HaShana?" He knows it all.

Now he and I go to synagogue together.

Not long ago Berta learned from Inna of the JRC that a Gala Chuppa is scheduled for June 1995. Her decision to stand under a Chuppa and her consent were instantaneous. Only then did she break the great news to me. My son and daughter-in-law say it is a wonderful example for them. I am quite happy. And my grandson, Valery seems to be the happiest of all.

A LEARNING PROCESS

An Interview with Arkady Ulitsky

I was born in Kiev and my wife Diana Mostovoy was born in St. Petersburg. We are here in Canada for fifteen years now. I always knew that the JRC existed, but I never was personally involved at all until quite recently. Up until then my life was almost completely devoid of Yiddishkeit, Judaism.

My wife, Diana, was the one who drew our family towards Yiddishkeit. She is artistic by nature, whereas I am a scientist. Diana developed an interest in Judaism and searched out her roots, while I remained in her shadow. I remember thinking, what could religion possibly have to offer me, a scientist, a physicist?

This skeptism slowly changed due to a combination of components.

A series of articles printed in the Russian newspaper, Exodus, that is published by the JRC caught my attention. In it, the author, Alexander Poltorak, a very talented individual, expounded on the Jewish holidays and their meaning. The articles were quite extensive and spurred my interest...

Then there were meetings with Rabbi Zaltzman. Through our discussions, it slowly dawned on me how deep Judaism is. It was more than a statement that G-d exists but a whole way of life.

I was also intrigued by a seminar I attended on the Codes of the Torah, which to me, as a scientist, was extremely impressive.

These were some of the initial attractions that lead us to lead a more traditional lifestyle in keeping with the laws of the Torah. Slowly we began to observe Shabbat, and every week we refrained from driving. Then we switched our home to Kosher food. We began attending Rabbi Zaltzman's Sunday morning classes at the JRC. He suggested books for us to read. We became friendly with the staff of the JRC who were very patient and understanding with us. They tried to show and teach us what Yiddishkeit is all about. Although I am an expert at lasers and physics, Judaism was totally new to me and I had to start from the very beginning.

Diana and I are still attending the JRC classes regularly. Tefillin is now something that I do every day. Our daughter, who is almost six, attends the synagogue with us. She is enrolled in the JRC day-care and is learning a tremendous amount about Judaism. She is constantly asking us what blessing to make on her food and comes home with beautiful songs and stories. This child will receive a good Jewish education.

We have progressed very much in the course of the year. Still though, I realize that, in Judaism, the learning is an endless process.. I thank the JRC for being there and helping us in our journey.

ACTS OF GOODNESS AND KINDNESS

The year 1990 marked a major turning point in human, and particularly Jewish history. During this year many Communist totalitarian regimes tumbled in rapid succession—Hungary, Poland, Rumania and Czechoslovakia. The Cold War finally ended and Jews were given complete and absolute freedom in the Soviet Union to practice their religion. All restrictions against emigration were lifted. Mass immigration to Israel brought over a quarter of a million Jews to our homeland.

At the end of this miraculous year of 1990, Israel experienced open miracles and wonders during the Persian Gulf War—a war and events that, as the Rebbe demonstrated to us, were prophesied in the Torah, as a prelude to the Messianic Era.

In 1991, the Rebbe informed us that all the suffering and self-sacrifice of centuries in galut, exile, would finally come to a complete close, with the dawn of a New Era, the Era of Mashiach. The Rebbe gave us a new mission: to prepare ourselves and the world for this new era by increasing in our acts of goodness and kindness. Mashiach is about to come, let's prepare to greet him!

THE POWER OF UNITY

In 1843, the Russian interior ministry called a "rabbinical conference" in the capitol of Petersburg. At the conference, the Czarist government, abetted by the leaders of the "Enlightenment" movement, tried to use the forum to implement a program of forced assimilation for the Jews of Russia. In the course of the conference, Rabbi Menachem Mendel of Lubavitch (also known as the Tzemach Tzedek, 1789-1866) was arrested no less than twenty two times for his "treasonous" stand in defense of traditional Jewish life.

One of the leading Rabbis of Russia subsequently asked him: "Rebbe, how could you put yourself at such risk?! If you have no concern for your own life, think of the many thousands who count upon your leadership. How would your Chassidim survive without you?!"

Rabbi Menachem Mendel replied: "First of all they have my children. [Rabbi Menachem Mendel had seven scholarly and pious sons, to whom he delegated many leadership tasks. After his passing, his youngest son, Rabbi Shmuel succeeded him in Lubavitch while another four of his sons established branches of Chabad Chassidut in other towns in White Russia and Ukraine.] Second of all, with their brotherly love and unity, Chassidim will persevere until the coming of Mashiach."

The Lubavitcher Rebbe told this story at a farbrengen, a Chassidic gathering, to mark the one hundredth anniversary of the passing of Rabbi Menachem Mendel—his great-great-great-grandfather and namesake—on the thirteenth day of Nissan, 5726 (April 3, 1966). He then said:

"It is now one hundred years after Rabbi Menachem Mendel's passing. Nor do we have any of his children with us. This leaves us only the second option: if we remain united, we can survive anything. We can succeed in overcoming the darkness of Galut, exile, and achieve the ultimate redemption of Mashiach. We must, however, remain united."

May we merit the coming of Mashiach now!

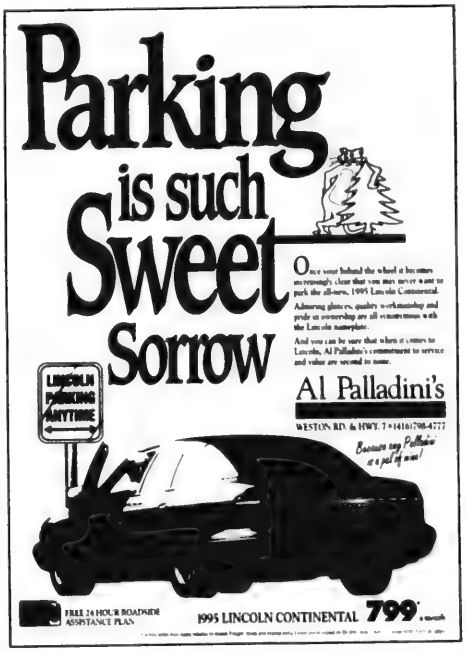
JRC FUTURE PLANS

To date, the Jewish Russian Community Centre of Greater Toronto operates out of 5 different locations. Our Synagogue, Talmud Torah (held at two locations), Daycare and Administrative offices are all in different areas making it difficult to supervise and co-ordinate.

During High Holidays, over 5,000 of our community members attend services and actually cannot get into the rented premises which serves as an alternate synagogue. There are numerous plans for expansion and further programs which cannot be realized mainly due to lack of proper facilities and adequate space.

Therefore, our Board of Directors has approved, after much thought and deliberation, to embark on a building campaign to raise funds for the construction of the NEW JEWISH RUSSIAN COMMUNITY CENTRE OF GREATER TORONTO.

At this point in time, committees are being formed and plans are being formulated. We are exploring land availabilities in order to choose the right site. The campaign will commence in the near future.



At the same time, we are preparing ourselves for the future years and the foreseen growth of our community and are therefore planning the following new facilities:

- Day School
- High School
- Yeshiva

To better serve our community there are also plans being laid to dedicate new branches in:

- Thornhill
- Richmond Hill
- Sheppard/Bathurst Area

A plan to better serve our brethren from the former USSR, of Sephardic descent, is being considered as well.

Altogether, these ambitious plans will hopefully succeed with the help of our members and the members of the Jewish community at large.

Israel-Syria talks resume

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher wrapped up his 13th round of Middle East shuttle diplomacy last weekend, securing his main objective: the resumption of military talks between Israel and Syria.

Although the talks were essentially agreed upon last month, Christopher officially announced top-level military officials from Israel and Syria will resume their negotiations later this month in Washington.

Christopher, returning to Israel on Saturday night after meeting earlier in the day with Syrian President Hafez al-Assad, said the June 27 talks in Washington would bring together the chief of staff of the Israel Defence Force, Lt.-Gen. Amnon Lipkin-Shahak, and his Syrian counterpart, Lt.-Gen. Hikmat Shihabi.

The talks are expected to last two or three days, Christopher said. After a break to allow the two sides to review the discussions, negotiations are scheduled to resume in Washington at a lower military level.

The resumption of military talks comes after similar negotiations in Washington in December were abruptly halted by Syria.

The two sides are trying to reach agreement on security arrangements for an Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights as part of a peace deal with Syria.

Terrorist may appeal ruling

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — There's "a very good chance" that a convicted Palestinian terrorist will appeal last Friday's decision denying him refugee status, says his lawyer.

Barbara Jackman told The CJN Monday morning that the reasons cited by a two-member Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) panel "lend themselves" to an appeal in the eight-year-old matter of Mahmoud Mohammad Issa Mohammad.

After a closed-door hearing that dragged on for more than two years, the IRB panel turned down Mohammad's bid to stay in Canada, saying he does not qualify as a refugee, and even if he did, would be excluded from this country for having committed "a serious non-political crime," according to Southam News.

The ruling means Mohammad, 52, will be deported unless he appeals to Federal Court. He has 15 days from the date of the decision to file an appeal, Jackman said.

Jackman said she couldn't discuss details of the ruling, but claimed the IRB panel "made decisions that are not supportive of the law."

Mohammad slipped into Canada in 1987 after obtaining an immigration visa by lying about his past.

In 1968, as a member of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, he was involved in an attack on an El Al jetliner in Athens that killed an Israeli man. A Greek court sentenced him in 1970 to 17 years in prison.

But he was deported to Lebanon less than a year later in a hostage exchange after Palestinian terrorists hijacked a Greek airliner.

Ottawa began deportation hearings in 1988, after it was discovered that Mohammad had been granted permanent residence. The RCMP tried to spirit him and and his family to either Algeria or Tunis, but the clandestine operation was aborted after the Canadian Security Intelligence Service was tipped off.

In December 1988, following much uproar in the Jewish community, an immigration adjudicator ordered him deported for having lied to get a visa.

But Mohammad, who lives in Brantford, Ont., with his wife and three children, staved off deportation by claiming refugee status.

B'nai Brith Canada and Canadian Jewish Congress welcomed the decision denying Mohammad's bid to remain here.

"Accepting the claim of a convicted terrorist who lied [to enter] Canada and declared himself a refugee to avoid deportation would have made a mockery of our refugee determination system," congress president Goldie Hershon said in a statement.

Likud split threatened

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Last week's threat by former foreign minister David Levy to break up the opposition Likud party could dramatically reshape Israel's political landscape.

The Likud is in the throes of a dramatic and damaging split, with Levy on the verge of announcing the creation of a breakaway party.

Analysis

"We have been pushed out," was the popular MK's bitter comment last Monday night, after the Likud's central committee overwhelmingly endorsed party leader Benjamin Netanyahu's proposals for electing its candidates for the Knesset list in the 1996 elections.

Levy and his camp claimed Netanyahu's proposals were specifically designed to maximize the leader's hold on the party and to squeeze out Levy supporters from winning Knesset seats in next year's national elections.

CANADA

Order of B.C.

VANCOUVER — The Order of British Columbia has been awarded to Isabelle Diamond, one of Vancouver's top fundraisers and an active Jewish community volunteer.

Diamond is one of 16 new inductees. The presentation was scheduled to be made June 13 in Victoria by Lt.-Gov. Garde Gardom.

Diamond has been active in State of Israel Bonds, Schara Tzedeck Congregation and the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver.

Honor for Rabbi Kelman

TORONTO — Rabbi Joseph Kelman of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue will be installed as the lifetime honorary president of the Lifschitz Teaching Seminary, Shiloh, at a ceremony in Jerusalem on June 25.

Guest speakers will be Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau and Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert.

The seminary is associated with Yeshivat Shiloh, a hesder yeshivah outside Jerusalem.

Fundraisers Honored

TORONTO — Two figures in the Jewish community have been honored for their service to philanthropy and fundraising.

Anne Tanenbaum was presented with the 1995 Outstanding Philanthropist Award by the National Society of Fund Raising Executives (NSFRE), Greater Toronto chapter.

Ken Wyman, one of Canada's foremost consultants and trainers in fundraising and volunteerism, was named Outstanding Fund Raising Executive by the NSFRE.

Tribute to Vickars

WINNIPEG — State of Israel Bonds last month honored longtime supporters Marion and Ed Vickar with the President's Club Award at the Winnipeg Convention Centre.

Originally from Melfort, Sask., Ed Vickar, now retired, was one of Winnipeg's leading car dealers.

Canadian JTS Grads

NEW YORK — Two Canadians have graduated from the Jewish Theological Seminary here. Carnie Shalom Rose of Winnipeg received rabbinic ordination. He will become an assistant rabbi in Columbus, Ohio.

Anna Urowitz-Freudenstein of Toronto received a master's of philosophy degree. She will continue to work toward a doctorate in Midrash.

U.S. Vice-President Al Gore was keynote speaker at the May 18 commencement.

ISRAEL

Hamas Arrests

JERUSALEM — Israeli security forces last week arrested some 45 members of Hamas.

They were suspected of planning to detonate a car bomb in Jerusalem, kidnap Israeli soldiers and hijack an Israeli bus, according to an Israel Defence Force statement.

The arrests came after a shootout in Hebron, in which Israeli soldiers killed a Hamas member who was on Israel's most-wanted list.

Jordan Has Office

JERUSALEM — Jordan has established a diplomatic office in the Gaza Strip.

Other countries with envoys in Gaza are Egypt, Morocco, Tunisia, Germany, Norway, Denmark, Greece and Turkey.

No Help: Red Cross

JERUSALEM — The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) will not bargain for Israeli prisoners of war, dead or alive, because doing so would contradict accepted procedure, says ICRC president Cornelio Sommaruga.

Sommaruga, who met the families of Israeli MIAs here last week, said, "We will do what we can to help the families, but there are great difficulties in this part of the world, especially with the different factions in Lebanon."

Rethinking Costs

JERUSALEM — Israel's defence costs are about a third higher than previously thought, the Bank of Israel announced last week.

A bank committee found that defence costs in 1993 were 4.3 billion shekels ($1.4 billion US) higher than the Central Bureau of Statistics' published figures.

The defence burden reached 18.5 billion shekels ($6.1 billion), or 14.3 per cent of the gross domestic product.

Cost of Emigrants

JERUSALEM — Those who immigrated to Israel between 1990 and 1994 and then left cost the state some 180 million shekels ($60 million US), according to a Treasury estimate.

The estimate says about 30,000 people who arrived in the four-year period, or 5.5 per cent of the total number of immigrants, later left the country.

Immigrants who leave within five years are obliged to repay any grants, loans or tax exemptions they received as absorption benefits, but the state rarely recovers those payments.

WORLD

Headstones Smashed

LONDON — British Jewry was on alert last week, after more than 90 headstones in two Jewish cemeteries here were smashed.

Scotland Yard said sledgehammers and pickaxes were used to destroy headstones in the East London and Humberside cemeteries. Police conducted house-to-house inquiries and have appealed for witnesses.

Sandra Brown new Federation head

'Must embody a system of ethical values'

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Sandra Brown

TORONTO — Bernard Ghert, outgoing president of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, has passed the torch to Sandra Brown.

Brown was elected president of Federation by acclamation at its annual general meeting last week.

The only other woman to have held this position was Rose Wolfe, who was president of the Toronto Jewish Congress, the predecessor of Federation, in 1978-79.

Brown, who has held many executive positions during her 27 years as a volunteer, told The CJN she "agonized" about taking on the presidency because of the enormity of the responsibility, but one of the reasons she accepted was to pave the way for other women leaders.

"There are not that many women who have an opportunity to hold leadership positions. And by not accepting, I might have prevented other women from having the same opportunity," she said.

Another gain for women at the meeting was the approval of a get amendment to Federation bylaws. Essentially any man refusing to give his wife a get will be prohibited from serving as a director or a representative on the Federation Council.

Strengthening Jewish values and making them the basis for decision-making at Federation was a common theme at the meeting.

In her acceptance speech, Brown told the audience of 200, "A Jewish federation must embody a system of ethical values ... I dream that our Jewish values will be at the core of every thing we do."

"We have to make sure we have a Jewish federation, not just a federation for Jews," Ghert said in his report summarizing the activities of Federation and some of the issues facing the organization in the second year of his presidency.

He said the restructuring of the Jewish Community Centre (JCC) into three independent centres last summer was time-consuming and costly.

As a result, Federation has established policies and guidelines to tighten the financial accountability of all the agencies affiliated with it, he said.

Ghert also reported he was proud that a computer program designed at Federation has been marketed to other Jewish federations in North America and Europe.

All those elected as delegates to Federation Council and representatives to the board of governors and board of directors won by acclamation.

Distinguished volunteer recognition awards were also presented at the meeting. The Ben Sadowski Award of Merit for an outstanding community leader went to York University professor Sydney Eisen for his contribution to the growth of Jewish studies in Toronto.

Eisen was instrumental in setting up the Jewish Studies program at York when he was Dean of Arts and he was the guiding force for the establishment of the York's Jewish Teachers' Education Program and Centre of Jewish Studies.

Eisen, who received a standing ovation, said education is the key to fostering Jewish continuity and "the best guarantee for later commitment and a love of Israel," with the training of Hebrew and Jewish studies teachers playing a pivotal role in this process.

The Shem Tov Award, presented annually to leaders representing the highest levels of excellence in volunteer service to Toronto, went to Rosanne Ain, Robert Berkovitz, Garry Foster, Elly Gotz, David Green, Aaron Landau, Beverly Lyons and Dr. Marvin Nash.

The Leadership Development Awards, established to encourage the assumption of community leadership roles by young men and women, were presented to Barbara Bank and David Barkin.

Community 'hopeful' after Ontario election

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish representation in Ontario's legislature dropped by one member following last week's Progressive Conservative sweep of the province.

There will be three Jewish MPPs — and, observers agree, a good chance of a cabinet minister — after Mike Harris is sworn in as Ontario's 22nd premier.

Voters dealt the governing New Democrats a stinging rebuke by reducing their majority to just 17 seats, while Harris's well-oiled campaign covered the map with blue, jumping from third place to a commanding 82 seats and 45 per cent of the popular vote.

Perhaps the biggest disappointment was the performance of Lyn McLeod's Liberals, who led in the polls early in the campaign but nosedived to wind up with 30 seats.

For the Jewish community, the Tory juggernaut translated into a loss for former Liberal cabinet minister Steven Offer, who went down to Conservative John Snobelen in Mississauga North.

Offer, first elected in 1985, told reporters last week he hadn't yet thought about returning to his law practice.

And there was something of a surprise in the province's most Jewish riding. Former cabinet minister Monte Kwinter managed to hang on to Wilson Heights for the Liberals. In the end, Kwinter polled nearly 11,000 votes to just over 8,500 for Tory newcomer Sam Pasternack, national commander of the Jewish War Veterans of Canada. Pasternack called it "a very respectable showing."

Next door in Willowdale, Conservative justice critic Charles Harnick defeated former Canadian Jewish Congress national president Les Scheininger, billed as a star candidate, by nearly a 2-1 margin.

Harnick told The CJN his team "over-estimated" Scheininger, and "that just propelled us to work even harder."

Harnick ducked a query on whether he's poised to become attorney-general, as has been widely rumored.

"I'm ready and anxious to do whatever I'm called upon," he said.

For his part, Scheininger said he had a sense things would get "difficult" for him in the campaign's final weeks.

There was another tight race in Oriole, where former Liberal health minister Elinor Caplan hung on to her seat by just over 1,000 votes, fending off a strong challenge from Tory Paul Sutherland.

Based on Harris's earlier statements, the Jewish community is "hopeful" the new government "will be positively disposed to funding independent and religious schools," Moshe Ronen, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress's Ontario region, told The CJN.

Harris has been "no more or less precise" on the issue than the other party leaders, but he seems "more open-minded" about government funding for Jewish day schools, which is now before Canada's Supreme Court.

"He has shown a desire to look at the issue, and we're excited about that," Ronen said.

Orthodox rabbi fights for human rights in Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With typical British understatement, Rabbi Isaac Newman describes reactions to his involvement in Rabbis for Human Rights, an Israeli watchdog group which won the 1993 Knesset Speaker's Award for Quality of Life.

"People are surprised that Orthodox rabbis are interested in human rights," he says.

Surprise is likely the mildest reaction that Rabbi Newman, 71-year-old past chair of the organization and one of only eight Orthodox rabbis among its 80 members, has encountered.

"Derision is not putting it too strongly — I would add the word 'hate,' " he admitted in a recent interview in Toronto. Rabbi Newman was referring to the attitude of congregants at the Jerusalem synagogue he still attends, albeit less frequently than he used to, preferring to pray in a less hostile environment.

Shomrei Mishpat, as the organization is known in Hebrew, was founded in 1988 to protect human rights both in the territories and within Israel's Green Line. Member rabbis have spoken out and interceded on issues including deportation of Arabs, house demolitions, arbitrary arrest and imprisonment without trial.

In Nablus, the group was instrumental in having an Arab home rebuilt by the Israeli government after it was "demolished by mistake." The rabbis were invited to the "chanukat habayit" (housewarming).

Rabbi Newman deplores the "double standard" applied to Jews and Arabs. "Baruch Goldstein's house remains sound with his family living there with all his possessions," he said. (Goldstein was the settler who killed 29 Palestinians at prayer in a Hebron mosque in February 1994.)

Rabbi Newman has been a member of Rabbis for Human Rights for the past six years, ever since he and his wife made aliyah from London, where he served as a congregational rabbi. All 10 of their grandchildren are sabras.

Rabbis for Human Rights was formed in order to "fill a void," said Rabbi Newman. "Unhappily the established authorities in the religious world [had been] silent."

Extended curfews which prevent Arab workers from entering Jerusalem are among the group's current concerns. "The people responsible for the atrocities have not been the people who've been prevented from entering Jerusalem. For example, suicide bombers have not been the people who have work permits," said the rabbi.

"I believe the ultimate security can only be friendship, and creating bridges with our neighbours."

Rabbi Newman is wont to quote the sage Hillel, with what has become his own creed: "What is hateful to you, don't do unto others."

Vivien Sharon installed as Toronto Hadassah head

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Vivien Sharon was installed last week as Toronto Hadassah-WIZO's 34th president.

Sharon, 42, vowed to strengthen membership, develop leaders, raise more money and better promote understanding of the women's charitable organization and its 78-year history.

Hadassah-WIZO membership across the country stands at 17,000. Toronto is the largest centre, with 3,500 members in 72 chapters.

Vivien Sharon

The organization raises funds for educational, social and medical projects in Israel through yearly events like the Hadassah Bazaar, which last fall raised over $300,000.

"When I get involved, I really get involved," Sharon said in explaining why she sought the two-year presidency. She replaces Fran Sonshine.

A Shachar chapter member, Sharon takes over just as Hadassah-WIZO is introducing two fund-raising campaigns: a July 27 golf day and a Nov. 5 tribute dinner for Maureen Kempston Darkes, the president and general manager of General Motors Canada. The dinner alone is expected to raise over $200,000 for battered women in Israel.

Pollard's parole hearing delayed

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The parole hearing scheduled last month for imprisoned spy Jonathan Pollard has been put off until September, Pollard's wife said here recently.

Had the hearing been held in May, it would have failed because of "the sheaf of negative recommendations" in Pollard's file from the American defence and intelligence establishments, Esther Zeitz Pollard told the Sephardi Discussion Group.

In fact, Pollard, convicted of passing secrets to Israel, stands "no chance" of being paroled, and his only hope for freedom is a U.S. presidential commutation, said Zeitz Pollard, who lives in Toronto and announced her marriage to the world's most famous prisoner last year.

In refusing to commute Pollard's life sentence last year, U.S. President Bill Clinton said the spy had caused harm to American security.

That, and allegations that Pollard's actions resulted in the deaths of U.S. agents, are "absolutely false," said his wife, citing what she called new evidence.

Recent calls for Pollard's release from the top Jewish organizations in the United States don't necessarily translate into action, she said.

Clinton, she noted, has turned down personal pleas on Pollard's behalf from Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin three times. "This is an ally?" she asked.

A one-time U.S. Navy intelligence analyst, Pollard was arrested in 1985 and sentenced two years later to life, despite a promise of leniency in return for a guilty plea.

In Israel, she said, her husband is known as "the ghost of the sealed rooms" because the information he passed on helped Israel prepare for the Gulf War.

"There has been no damage and there are no bodies," she said. "So why is Jonathan Pollard still in prison?"

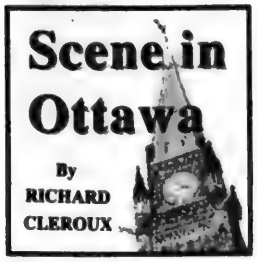
Dry Bones

From coast to coast

Gray enjoys the fun of politics



OTTAWA — One day, a little more than four decades ago in Windsor, Ont., a young man approached the old Liberal political warhorse, Paul Martin, who was then minister of Health and Welfare, and told him that he wanted to make politics his life.

The man replied that if the boy worked diligently and learned his politics well, he might some day aspire to make it to Parliament, and perhaps even into the cabinet.

The youth took his mentor's advice to heart, worked long and hard, and today Herbert E. Gray is not only in the federal cabinet as solicitor general of Canada and government House leader, but he also holds the record as the dean of the Ottawa parliamentarians, the longest-serving MP in the Commons, an unbroken 33-year record that goes all the way back to the general election of 1962.

He also holds the distinction of being the first Jew to be sworn in to a federal cabinet in Canada, on Oct. 20, 1969, as minister without portfolio in the first Pierre Trudeau administration.

Gray grew up in Windsor, the son of local department store owner Harry Gray, whose family had come from Belarus at the turn of the century. His mother was the late Fannie Lifitz. People remember him working in the family store during school holidays.

Although he attended McGill University and Osgoode Hall Law School, Gray never forgot his family roots in Windsor nor his Jewish identity.

Gray doesn't make a big production out of being Jewish, but he did wear his yarmulke at his official swearing in as a member of the Jean Chrétien cabinet and posed for the official photograph with his head covered.

In Ottawa he lives in the Alta Vista neighborhood near the Machzikei Hadas Synagogue on Virginia Drive so that he can easily walk to synagogue on the Sabbath. He maintains a second home in Windsor, which is also close to a synagogue he attends.

When Gray sneaks off occasionally during the noon hour on weekdays to do a little shopping at The Bay in the downtown Rideau Centre mall, his aides joke that young Herb is still checking out the competition's prices for his dad. Actually, he's shopping for himself, which he likes to do, and often returns to Parliament for an afternoon session laden with a huge bag full of rock 'n' roll CDs.

Gray is a man of secret passions. Rock 'n' roll is one of them. He is a big John Cougar Mellencamp fan. His daughter Elizabeth's friends used to compliment her on her "cool" record collection. "It's my dad's," she would have to answer.

The House of Commons security guards tell stories about the old days when they would catch him still at work in his Parliament Hill office in the middle of the night, with a tape recorder playing rock 'n' roll songs full blast. Headphones solved the problem.

Gray is an accomplished pianist, and still plays frequently — in private. He is often seen riding his bicycle around his neighborhood.

His reputation for secretly being a great comedian goes back several years. During an inter-regnum between John Turner and Jean Chrétien, Gray found himself interim party leader and it fell upon him to deliver a "funny" speech to the Annual Press Gallery Dinner.

Unexpectedly, Gray stole the show that night, unleashing a riotous series of self-deprecating one-liners that had the gallery's hardened, ink-stained wretches rolling in the aisles, chanting "Herb! Herb! Herb!" as if they were endorsing a leadership candidacy. They had discovered that beneath the taciturn, dull, plodding exterior they knew, lurked a Jackie Vernon in the making.

A legend was born that night. Gray instantly became an "in" color on Parliament Hill. A leadership slogan was invented — "Paint the Town Gray."

At the last Press Gallery dinner, Gray was portrayed in a video spoof as a Parliament Hill's new sex symbol. (He had actually scored quite high in a Hill Times newspaper poll, in which respondents were asked to name the sexiest MP.) The gallery dinner take-off showed Gray fighting off a legion of female fans as he shouted, "Leave me alone," and waved his umbrella threateningly at them.

For Gray it was all part of the fun of politics.

Martin Buber, as individual

Philosopher, theologian, teacher and leader, Martin Buber was an original thinker of immense proportion. He was born in Vienna in 1878 and died in Jerusalem on June 13, 1965. In this issue, we commemorate the 30th anniversary of his passing through a personal reminiscence by Emil Fackenheim.

Buber's ideas and theories were not universally accepted. In fact, they were regarded by many not merely as controversies, but as heresies. For example, his early call for a bi-national state was scorned by political rightists and leftists alike. His personally liberal interpretation of Judaism was condemned by many Orthodox. And his advocacy of reconciliation with postwar Germany was resented by a broad spectrum of the population.

But his death struck Israel like a thunderclap. The first person to come to the family's house after the announcement of his death was Zalman Shazar, the president of Israel. Next came David Ben-Gurion and S.Y. Agnon. They sat by the body for five hours.

Prime minister Levi Eshkol was the first to eulogize the much-beloved 87-year-old professor-teacher-scholar, who, by the time of his death had shrunk to the size of a child. Eshkol's words rang through the silent air at the Hill of Rest in Jerusalem, where Buber was buried:

"The Jewish people today mourns a luminary and a teacher, a man of thought and achievement, who revealed the soul of Judaism with a new philosophic daring. All mankind mourns with us one of the spiritual giants of this century. I do not know whether there is anyone else in our midst, in the sphere of spiritual life, who was so much a part of the heritage of the entire world; but he was deeply anchored – to a depth that few could reach – in his Jewishness, in the Jewish people, in the resurgence of Israel and the love of Jewry."

...as metaphor

Despite the differences, the bitter disputes and the frequent partings-of-the-way which his views engendered, his life was seen by the majority of Israel — religious and secular — as a deeply searching quest to match man's heart to God's essence.

The arguments with him and about him were, as our sages understood and sanctioned, arguments "for the sake of heaven." They were arguments over differing views of the truth, aimed at the proposals not at the proponents, at the ideas not at man.

Would that the arguments dividing the Jewish people today could be conducted in that same spirit and out of that same sense of respect for differing views.

The current peace process has caused sharp divisions among the Jewish people in Israel and in the Diaspora. Increasingly, we see people rather than ideas being vilified. Arguments once directed at the merits of an issue are now directed ad hominem. This is an ominous development.

For the sake of our people, we must return to arguing our differences "for the sake of heaven."

Democracy's journey

An American journalist once wrote: "People who want to understand democracy should spend less time in the library with Aristotle and more time on the buses and in the subway." The truth of this sublime observation was proved yet again, just last week when, in a decisive, unambiguous manner, Ontario voters changed provincial governments. With 82 of the 130 seats in the Legislature, Progressive Conservatives will now form the government; New Democrats and Liberals the Opposition.

As in all democratic exercises, the outcome was very important, but the process was paramount. Indeed, that is why we cherish democracy. For, in a world of imperfect people, it provides as perfect a way as possible of changing governments.

Democracy travels and affirms itself on the thoroughfares of everyday life. Thus, we commend all the candidates in last week's election; they enabled us to travel with them and in the process, have already paved the way for the next journey.

As is its proper responsibility, this newspaper will hold the new government — as it has all prior governments — to account for its policies and decisions on matters of concern to our community. But for now, we extend our best wishes to and invoke God's blessings upon premier-elect Mike Harris. May he and his cabinet administer the affairs of government "in justice and equity; may peace and security, happiness and prosperity, right and freedom forever abide among us."

"Friends" in each generation

I arrived in Montreal in 1947 from Northern Ontario, where I worked as a wood cutter cutting pulp wood for the paper industry. When our contract was over, I came to Montreal with some of my colleagues. Of course, we didn't know anyone here — that was true — but we certainly had friends here, unknown to us. These "friends" were waiting for us at the train station. They were representatives of the Canadian Jewish Congress. They placed us in a downtown hotel and also gave a bit of money to those of us who had no money (which was nearly all of us). It was just wonderful, like a good family taking care of its own. We should never forget this human act of kindness.

Many years have gone by. The world has changed a great deal. Governments have come and gone. But the good heart of our people has not changed. Love and care go on and when the need arises, we act in good faith and are there for those who need it.

I sometimes work in the CJC building. One evening some months ago, I passed by an open room. Inside was a large group of Russian immigrants busily learning English. Another night, in the same room, perhaps the same group was instructed in the intricacies of French. It made me feel proud to belong to such a caring and giving community. It proved that we are indeed "our brothers' keepers."

The views shared by Gazit and Peace Now

The lead quote in Amy Sattin's interview with IDF Maj.-Gen. (Res.) Shlomo Gazit (CJN June 1) would lead most readers to conclude that Gazit and Peace Now have little or nothing in common, when the exact reverse is true.

The logical question for Sattin to have asked Gazit is why Canadian Friends of Peace Now sponsored Gazit's visit to Toronto and why he accepted.

The answer is that on the basic issues of peace and security, Peace Now shares the views of Gazit — and most other Israeli military officers both in active and reserve service.

Those views include a strong IDF with a qualitative technological edge over its enemies and the active pursuit of political settlements and viable security arrangements with the Palestinians and Israel's Arab neighbors.

Specifically, Peace Now shares Gazit's views on the following: ending the occupation and expansion of settlements in the West Bank, talking to the PLO, acceptance of a Palestinian state and territorial compromise on the Golan as well as the West Bank.

Gazit sees global and regional changes as the real movers of change in the Middle East, and questions Peace Now's role, impact and what he describes as its "naive" trust in dialogue — but he most assuredly supports its existence.

Too bad Gazit didn't say publicly what he said privately: "Peace Now is a voice which must be heard — every society needs a voice of conscience."

Feeling the centrality of Jerusalem

Let me share with you the inspiring and extraordinary experience of welcoming the dawn of the Shavuot festival at the Kotel Hama'aravi.

By 5 a.m. on Sunday morning the entire plaza at the Western Wall was packed and all approaches were choked with humanity streaming from all over Jerusalem. The crowd of men and women, young and old, boys and girls, gathered to celebrate the giving of the Torah on this day in ancient history. I stood among Sephardim and Ashkenazim, Chassidim and Mitnagdim, white shirts and black garb, citizens of Jerusalem and visitors, tourists from all over the world.

Next to me stood a man who recounted that in 1944, he was in Auschwitz on this day, not daring to think that he would survive, and now he was witnessing this marvel of Jewish survival and revival. Slowly the dark of dawn broke into light and the emerging sun watched over the vast throng of men and women who prayed and sang in celebration of this glorious day. The doves watched from their crevices of the Wall and hundreds of birds chirped overhead in ecstasy and sang their morning song.

When we walked home at 7 a.m. through the market and the Damascus Gate under the watchful eye of young soldiers, new crowds were still converging on the plaza of the Western Wall. What a heartwarming sight!

This was true and genuine Zionism in action and a grand demonstration of the centrality of Jerusalem and Zion and of the love and loyalty of Jews to Jewish tradition and Jewish history.

Community ignores gays and lesbians

I attended a discussion at Holy Blossom Temple dealing with equality for gays and lesbians, in law and in the synagogue. There were probably 60 Jews in attendance, but other than gays, lesbians, their families and friends, the evening drew less than 10 members of the community. The event was well publicized at both the Temple and in the community at large.

I recently resorted to going to the Metropolitan Community Church for a sense of community, affirmation and spirituality. MCC is well known as a sanctuary for both the gay and straight community. I avoid all references to Jesus and am amazed and saddened when I look around and see the approximately 30 or so Jews who do the same thing within a group of over 300 Christians.

Last night only reinforced my belief that Jews say they are liberal, "but not in my temple." Blame my parents, but I believe that the Jewish community should be welcoming and at the forefront of every human rights issue. If we cannot make our own children in Canada feel wanted then why do our leaders spend so much time and money on programs for Russian Jews and other discriminated against groups? Where is the leadership of the rabbis (only two were there and one of them was a guest speaker), community leaders and this newspaper? Whether you like it or not, gays and lesbians are Jewish, and homosexuality is as old as our religion. We don't want to be outreached to and we don't have to be approved of, we just want to be accepted. Not very different from what our forefathers wanted in coming to Canada.

Perspectives

Remembering Martin Buber

By EMIL L. FACKENHEIM

In 1958, my wife and I visited Martin Buber, who was then at Princeton. Having told us that he started thinking only when he was 40 years old, he turned to my wife and asked: "Mrs. Fackenheim, have you started thinking yet?" Rose was then 25 years old.

I have often told the story because it is funny. But the serious part is about Buber himself. At 40 he was already a much-published, even widely recognized author. What he told us was that only at 40 did he achieve a breakthrough. And I believe he would have been forgotten long ago without that breakthrough.

I am using the over-used word in a very pregnant sense: in his brief but great and immensely influential I and Thou, Buber's thought broke through to the God of Israel. The significance of this emerges only against the background of the preceding religious situation, in Protestant as well as Jewish thought, including Buber's own. (Catholic thought was different.)

Within Judaism and Christianity, as well as Islam, pre-modern humanity understood itself as the recipient, through a holy Scripture, of divine revelation and saw God, who was the Giver, as other-and-higher-than-humanity. But with the advent of modernity that philosophy was called into question. One could believe in God, perhaps even experience Him, but was there, objectively, a God other than the subjective belief in Him or the merely subjective experience of Him? And was Scripture, rather than the Word of God, the mere word of man, the product of human beliefs and experiences? It seemed that the belief could be retained only on the authority of the Scriptures, and for modernity such authority came more and more to be viewed as blind authority, acceptable only by those who came to be called "fundamentalists."

In I and Thou Buber breaks through the subjectivism of mere belief or experience, to the God who is "the Other" — other than both. He points to a possible "encounter" with God, and the One encountered is other than the one that does the encountering. He teaches "dialogue" with God, and it takes two for there to be a dialogue. These terms, as well as some others that are now part of the general cutlure, go back to Buber.

How does he justify his breakthrough? By the now famous distinction between two types of relation, the "I-It" and the "I-Thou." When I perceive a stone or sit on a chair or drive a car I have an I-It relation; I perceive an object or use it. When I speak and listen to a person I have an I-Thou relation. But it is a bit more complicated. Relations between people can be I-It relations, such as when I use the services of a secretary and the secretary uses me to draw a salary.

Buber also asserts that there are I-Thou relations with animals and even, as if to make a point, with inanimate objects. The point made is that at issue are not two kinds of being but two kinds of relation. And the point of points concerns an asserted relation with God. To make God into an object of thought is to lose Him, which is why the existence of God cannot be either proved or refuted. If God is not known through encounter with Him, in dialogue with Him, He is not known at all.

This is why I have referred above not to God-in-general, but to the God of Israel. Elsewhere God may be understood as Being or Substance, or even as the divine Nothing. In Judaism, He is King, Father and above all, He who speaks to Abraham, Moses, the prophets. And even when, according to Judaism, prophecy has ceased, there still is a bat kol (daughter of a voice).

For Buber, the Greeks were the people of the eye but the Jews are the people of the ear. In this, Buber does not mean to restrict the God of Israel to Israel. In I and Thou, he states that God speaks constantly and wherever there are humans. And the great challenge for humans is to open their ears and listen. But, let this not be forgotten, humans speak as well as listen.

The year Buber was at Princeton he was invited by Commentary for a meeting. There one of the high-powered intellectuals asked him a piercing question. "I go to shul," he said, or words to this effect, "and stand before God as the legend above the Torah ark says I should, and truly feel I am encountering Him in prayer. But when I leave shul and think modern thoughts, such as Marxist or Freudian ones He becomes an illusion, a mere projection of subjective feelings."

Buber replied that this was the sickness of modernity. He combats it through the teaching — to give a crucial example — that love between humans does not consist of feelings in the one, the other, and a question mark between them, so that the two are really two solitudes. Love is between people, and for humans to love each other is not to have private feelings but to enter into a relation, into the responsibility of mutuality, of listening as well as speaking. It is, in short, a "commitment." Here is yet another term that, through Buber, has entered into common discourse.

But inter-human I-Thou relations are one thing, one with God is quite another. That even this can be mutual is the bold, great assertion of Judaism. But that it exists at all — the basic problem for modernity — may be considered to require a "leap of faith." But this is Soren Kierkegaard's Christian term. Buber expresses his Jewishness in his view that through an I-Thou relation with humans one might reach an I-Thou relation with God. His friend Franz Rosenzweig, who laid great stress on mitzvot, said that through mitzvot (the commandments), one might reach a relation with the metzaveh, the One who does the commanding. But his friend would agree with Buber that while moderns cannot have security in faith they can have openness to faith.

Buber may have started thinking at 40 but he never stopped, and he lived to 87. His works on Chassidism, some written before age 40, others later, were a great source of strength for German Jewish youth in their time of greatest need, the early years of the Hitler regime. For my part, filled as they are with Jewish spirit, I think they are still the best introduction to Judaism for those who want not just information but an inspiring access to Judaism. In my view, his most lasting contributions are his works on the Bible, and not surprisingly so. As the great figures of the Bible believed themselves to be standing in an I-Thou relation to the God of Israel, Buber gave that ancient affirmation a modern reality.

I therefore once considered it fitting to call Buber a Hebrew prophet in modern garb and used that expression in an essay. When we visited him, Buber had read the essay and asked me to remove the term. Obviously, he thought that modesty required it. I consented and substituted "sage" for "prophet."

Buber took issue with another point in my essay, this one so substantial that I have never forgotten it. I had written that while I and Thou teaches that God speaks constantly, in his later works Buber "changes his mind." Just as in an eclipse there is darkness because the moon has come between us and the sun, so there is, in the world today, an "eclipse of God;" to be sure, God is not dead, but something has come between Him and ourselves. The question of how we can have a relation with God is, after Auschwitz, darker, more painful, more threatening than ever before.

Buber asked me: "I have changed my mind?" or words to this effect. That was a deep question. For Buber reality itself had changed. Between the 1920s and the 1940s an abyss was torn up, and future Jewish thought must cope with it.

This was his response after the Holocaust. Another occurred just when it was about to start. In the 1938 Kristallnacht they had burned, looted, beaten, arrested. Friends of the great Ghandi had asked him to respond, but must have regretted having done so. For Gandhi urged German Jews to fight the Nazis with "soul power," and if necessary to die in the process. He also attacked Zionism, asserted that Palestine belonged to the Arabs and that Zion was a symbol. Buber, an admirer of Gandhi and on the whole mild-mannered, could be militant when the situation required it. Zion, he declared, was indeed a symbol, but it would be a "poor symbol" if it was not also a "spot on earth." Buber, a source of strength to German Jews in their despair, stayed with them for a long time, but at length moved to that "spot on earth," and lived there till he died.

Racquets, not rockets

Something new is happening in Israel that has not made the public press. Not rocket attacks from Lebanon, not terror raids by suicide bombers — the kinds of things that will make headlines. Something quiet and wonderful is going on in some parts of the country which all of us should know about.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

It started with a simple proposition: give children, especially disadvantaged children, an opportunity to expend their energy in ways other than destruction, hooliganism, drugs and general disrespect for society.

Many nations are struggling with this problem, but in Israel the solution has taken an unusual turn. It has made a leisure time activity which formerly was reserved for "upper" classes into an accessible activity for kids of every stripe — tennis.

"Tennis anyone?" was once a question that often found no answer, with few players around and little interest. But it is different in Israel.

Today 11 sport centres are distributed across the country from north to south: from Kiryat Shemona, Tiberias and Haifa in the north; to Ramat Hasharon, Tel Aviv, Jaffa, Jerusalem and Ashkelon in the centre; to Ofakim, Arad and Beersehva in the Negev.

There, kids from the marvellous collection of backgrounds which characterizes Israel meet. They are bussed in, their racquets are supplied, and so are their balls and their instructors — everything is free and everything without government assistance.

But it isn't just tennis; that is just how the children are attracted. The real focus is their way of looking at society, their spirit of cooperation and their respect for others.

Crime rates and juvenile delinquency have dropped measurably where children's community centres have opened. Study halls, libraries and tutors at each centre encourage scholarship, cultural understanding and academic excellence.

Physically and mentally handicapped children are welcomed to comprehensive wheelchair tennis instruction and other programs designed for each group's needs.

Last but not least, Arab and Jewish children mingle and thus give promise that living together is not an idle dream.

Though they are called tennis centres they have expanded into education centres with libraries and social workers who help recent immigrants to Israel integrate into their new societies. Parents too are now getting involved with their children, with the result that these activities have an enormous impact on the lives of many. The effect spreads not only by word of mouth but by example.

The veteran coach who supervises this wide-ranging organization is a former dentist from South Africa, Ian Froman, who has organized all this with the help of a devoted nation-wide staff.

Though tennis is still the sporting activity at the centres, with national and international tournaments that attract the best players around, the emphasis is inevitably shifting to an emphasis on social values.

Disadvantaged neighborhoods have been turned into desirable real estate locations as a result. Writes Froman: "Ashkalon was built in the boondocks and now it is surrounded by beautiful apartments with thousands of Russian immigrants in the centre. Hi-tech companies have built around the tennis centre in Haifa." Suddenly these centres have turned neglected neighborhoods into beautiful areas and Froman is right when he says it's great.

Now, as every year, a group of these children is making an international tour. Some are very young (under 10), and they represent every type of Israeli from old-timer to newcomer. They will be in Toronto on June 25. If you want to get more information call Sandi Kaminsky at 905-660-1999. I hope some of you who have never been there will come and tell me you have read this column and want to see it all with your own eyes.

Comparative law: child support

A recent Canadian Supreme Court ruling rejected the position of Suzanne Thibaudeau, a divorced mother who claimed she should not have to pay taxes on child support payments received from her former husband. She and her associates maintain it is unfair and discriminatory that her former husband can use the payments as tax deductions and she cannot.

By Rabbi Mark Dratch

What is the position of Jewish law in this matter? Halachah calls for strict integrity in tax payment and considers tax evasion as "robbery of the public." Samuel di Medina (Salonika, 16th century) classified tax evaders as robbers and disqualified them from serving as witnesses. He urged them to calculate the "profit gained as a result of fraud against the loss of the World to Come."

Authorities suggest a number of sources for the halachic obligation to pay taxes: the rights of a monarch outlined in I Samuel 8:11-17; dina d'malchuta dina (the law of the state is the law), the binding nature of civil law; the community as a partnership in which all parties have a responsibility to contribute to its welfare; and minhag, communal custom.

As to halachic guidelines in tax equity, Rashba (Rabbi Solomon b. Abraham Adret, Spain, 13th century) is representative of most opinions when he writes, "Nowhere are the tax laws founded on talmudic sanctity and everywhere there are to be found variations of such laws deriving from local usage and the consent of earlier scholars who set the policies; and the town residents are entitled to establish fixed enactments and uphold recognized customs even if they do not accord with Halachah, this being a matter of civil law. Therefore if in this matter they have a known custom it should be followed since in matters of this kind minhag mevatelet halachah (custom overrides the law)." (Responsa Rashba IV;260).

Rabbi Israel Isserlein (Austria, 15th century) wrote that despite the priority of communal custom and legislation, rules of taxation should be established in the spirit of Torah principles (Terumat haDeshen, no. 342).

Nevertheless, there are halachic restrictions. Rules of taxation may not be discriminatory. Those that do violate the principles of equity and justice are invalid, since they are "nothing but robbery and it is not possible to stipulate contrary to the law of robbery" (Responsa Rashba, V, 178).

Jewish law recognized the importance of tax relief for various groups of people. Thus the poor and socially disadvantaged may have been totally exempt from taxes, or may have paid a minimal amount (Responsa Rosh, 6:4). Torah scholars were exempt from paying taxes as well (Baba Batra 7b).

Is there a halachic position on whether child support monies should be taxed in the hands of the parents who pay it or in the hands of the parents who receive it?

In the Canadian debate, some argue that since, in general, custodial parents are in a lower economic bracket than non-custodial parents, it is unfair the former should pay money to the government from their more modest means. Others counter by observing that it is because the custodial parent is in a lower tax bracket that less money is paid in taxes and more money is actually available for the children. In fact, because of this tax advantage, it is estimated that the government is in effect subsidizing child support by about $300 million annually. If any discrimination is occurring, it is against couples who remain married and cannot take advantage of these deductions.

Tax advantages may be lost when both parents have similar incomes or the custodial parent earns more than the other. In such cases, if the tax ramifications are not properly considered, the children may end up with less support.

Jewish law maintains that parents are responsible for the maintenance and welfare of their children and, therefore determinations of the amounts of child support payments should be made with the best interests of the child in mind. Thus, whether one parent or another may claim the tax exemption is secondary to providing sufficient monetary support. If society, in developing its tax policies, and the courts, in determining appropriate amounts of support, determine that one method or another is more advantageous to the needs of the children, and if sufficient support awards are made — and enforced! — to cover the tax liabilities of that policy, then who pays the taxes is halachically irrelevant.

Modern Chassidic tales

The touching story is told — yes, I know, you've probably heard it already — about a spaceship which flies over Bathurst Street above Steeles (that's Thornhill, folks), and slowly comes to a landing in a vacant lot. Out step several tall, lanky aliens dressed all in black, with shtreimls and kaftans and long, curly payot. One shocked, excited man rushes up to them and asks, "Where are you from?"

By Allan Gould

"We're from Mars," smiles the leader, in perfect Yiddish-tinged English.

"Wow!" says the Canadian. "Does everyone dress like you, up in Mars?"

"No," replies the alien. "Just the Chassidim!"

What's the point? Well, Chassidim are everywhere, a crucial part of the Jewish nation. Which is why I was shocked and excited myself to discover another batch of Modern Chassidic Tales.

Said the Farklemper Rebbe: "Happy is he who ends his days in repentance and holy service, and dies with a clear conscience. In fact, I wouldn't mind getting the name of his accountant."

"There are many reasons for a woman to drink wine," said the Outremont Rebbetzin. "To rejoice in the works of HaShem. To fulfill the ancient Purim tradition of getting so smashed that one cannot tell the difference between Tonya Harding and Nancy Kerrigan. To relax on Friday night, after feeding a dozen noisy and hungry children, pooh-pooh-pooh. But most of all, to be able to live in the same house with the Outremont Rebbe, who is no picnic, let me tell you."

Once upon a time there came to the great Maggid of Bathurst a man who fasted from Shabbat to Shabbat, and used to brag about it. "To fast so much is hardly praiseworthy," proclaimed the Great Maggid. "If you knew what they paid me at our shul, you'd know that some people have to fast from Shabbat to Shabbat just in order to survive. I used to think that the Exile from the Holy Land was the worst agony of the Jews, but I now think that just working for other Jews is the worst agony. Maybe I could borrow a ten-spot until next Sunday? Let's do lunch sometime, by the way. Your treat."

The Narishkeiter Rebbe used to have serious problems getting a minyan for Shabbat morning, and this troubled him greatly, not to mention making it difficult for those who were saying Kaddish.

"Why do you think I have such a hard time to get 10 men to daven with us on Shabbat?" asked the Glorious Narishkeiter of one of the four men who sat there, twiddling their thumbs, waiting for others to show up.

"Have you ever noticed that you tend to expound on the Holy Law at exceedingly great length on Shabbat mornings?" queried his Torah-reader, who was no great shakes at his role in the synagogue, either.

"Shame on you!" said the Narishkeiter. "You shouldn't be wearing a watch on the Great Day of Rest!"

"It's not a watch we need, when you start to talk," mumbled the shammas to himself. "It's a calendar."

The Altalena incident

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Later this month, Israel marks a sombre anniversary, a still controversial event that pushed it to the brink of civil war.

Forty-seven years ago, the Altalena — a 1,820-ton ship brimming with 900 new immigrants, weapons and ammunition — set sail from Sete, France, bound for Israel.

The Altalena, and its cargo of munitions, had been purchased by the Irgun Zvai Leumi, the fighting arm of the Zionist Revisionist Betar/Herut movement, headed by Menachem Begin.

The odyssey of the Altalena unfolded as a United Nations-monitored ceasefire ended the first phase of the 1948-49 War of Independence. Though the truce forbade the shipment of fresh arms to Israel and its Arab adversaries, the Altalena carried, among other things, 5,000 rifles, 300 Bren guns, five armored cars, four million rounds of bullets and several thousand bombs.

The military equipment, which had been bought from France, was destined for Irgun units in Palestine. However, the Irgun did not inform David Ben-Gurion, Israel's Labor party prime minister, of the Altalena's voyage until several days after its departure.

Due to this time lapse, mutual mistrust and animosity between Ben-Gurion and Begin, miscalculations by both sides and Ben-Gurion's impression that the Irgun intended to stage a putsch, violence broke out and brought the newly-found Jewish state to the precipice of fratricidal warfare.

"Israel was very close to civil war," says Ilana Tsur, a Tel Aviv filmmaker who recently finished what she claims is the first documentary on the topic.

The 53-minute film, entitled Altalena, was screened at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival in May and at several Jewish film festivals in the United States shortly afterward. Before its North American debut, Altalena was given a limited release in Israel, having been shown at the Cinematheque in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem and to parliamentarians at the Knesset. In the third week of June, Altalena is scheduled to be broadcast by Israel's private television station, Channel 2, which helped finance the film.

Tsur, 52, is not surprised that hers is the only movie to deal with the incident. "It's such an explosive subject," she said in an interview. "No one wanted to touch it."

For Tsur, a graduate of the Hebrew University and Boston University, the Altalena is not merely a ship crowned by an aura of notoriety, but a strong childhood memory. For about a year after it was sunk by shell fire, the Altalena lay partially submerged in shallow waters, just off Tel Aviv's beach front. Tsur recalls catching glimpses of the wreck in strolls with her father, and remembers whispered conversations of adults as they discussed the fate of the ship and the stormy events surrounding it.

Tsur spent three years making Altalena, poring over dusty archives, searching for appropriate photographs and historic footage and interviewing such surviving participants as Yitzhak Rabin, Eliyahu Lankin and Dov Shilanksy.

Rabin, the present prime minister, was the deputy commander of the militia — the Palmach — which played a central role in the crisis. Lankin, the late Likud stalwart and ambassador to South Africa, commanded the Irgun squad on the Altalena. Shilansy, the current Speaker of the Knesset, was a Holocaust survivor who witnessed the turmoil.

Tsur claims she had no intention of producing a "balanced" film. "I don't believe in objectivity." Nevertheless, Altalena is a cool, dispassionate cinematic document, tracing the conflicting interests and the confusion which lay at the heart of the tragedy.

The saga of the Altalena began in June, as a ceasefire stopped one month of bitter fighting in the War of Independence. In the south, Egyptian forces had advanced beyond Ashdod. In the centre, Trans-Jordan's Arab Legion had captured Eastern Jerusalem and blocked an Israeli offensive against Latrun. In the north, Israel had barely repulsed attacks by Syria and Iraq. Having lost 1,176 soldiers, an exhausted Israel used the truce to replenish its strength while girding for the inevitable "second round" with the Arabs.

At this juncture, Israel did not have a completely unified army. After Ben-Gurion's proclamation of statehood in May 1948, Begin had agreed to disband the Irgun and place it at the disposal of the government. Ben-Gurion had insisted that all Jewish militias — the Haganah, the Irgun and the Palmach — should join the nascent Israel Defence Force (IDF).

But integration took time, and meanwhile, the three Zionist militias — which were not finally merged until November of that momentous year — existed as separate entities with their own officers. Furthermore, the merger agreement did not apply to Jerusalem, which was legally outside the territory of the state under the 1947 United Nations Palestine partition plan.

The Altalena burns as spectators watch.

The problem was exacerbated by Shmuel Katz, the Irgun's Paris representative. He was a radical among extremists who resented the United Nations ceasefire. Begin, his superior, opposed it in principle but would not violate it. When he learned of the Altalena's sailing on the BBC World Service, he was stunned. Begin radioed Lankin and the ship's captain, Monroe Fein, ordering them to keep away and await instructions. The message was received, but disregarded.

On June 15, Begin overrode his colleagues' objections and informed Yisrael Galili, one of Ben-Gurion's deputies, of the Altalena's imminent arrival. Incredibly enough, the Israeli authorities had missed the BBC broadcast. After consulting Ben-Gurion, Galili ordered the Altalena to land at Kfar Vitkin, a pro-Labor party moshav near Netanya, and unload its arms there.

Galili incorrectly assumed that Begin would hand over the vessel and its cargo unconditionally. And tension rose to the boiling point over a misunderstanding regarding the distribution of the weaponry on board the Altalena.

On June 19, Galili advised Ben-Gurion that a "new and dangerous situation has arisen, a demand for a kind of private army, with private weapons, for certain units in the army." Amid reports that the Altalena was nearing Israel's coast and that hundreds of Irgun soldiers were deserting their units and heading toward Kafr Vitkin, Ben-Gurion called a cabinet meeting at which he denounced "separatist activities" and charged the IDF with responding to the imminent threat.

Ben-Gurion seemed convinced that the Irgun was planning a coup. In his recently published memoirs, Battling For Peace, Shimon Peres — Israel's foreign minister — writes that Ben-Gurion "suspected that [the Irgun] would try to set up a state within a state or a separate army." Tsur doubts whether Begin, whom she describes as a "tragic hero" in this episode, was hatching a plot to topple the government. The Irgun, she believes, was trying to deliver badly-needed weaponry to its soldiers in Jerusalem and thereby gain greater influence over military decisions in that sector.

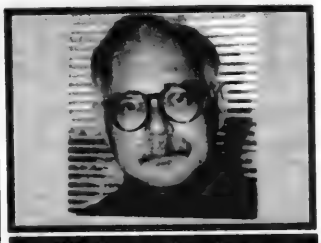
Whatever the truth, a climax was fast approaching. On June 21, Begin's associates tried to convince him to take the Altalena to Tel Aviv, sure in the knowledge that the Altalena would receive a warmer reception there. While they deliberated, the rattle of machine gun fire was heard. A pitched battle, pitting the IDF against the Irgun erupted. The skirmish claimed six Irgun men and two IDF soldiers.

As two government corvettes closed in on the Altalena, Begin, complaining bitterly, was hauled aboard. The Altalena reached Tel Aviv on June 22, in full view of reporters, United Nations observers and a myriad of spectators. Yigal Allon, a future foreign minister, was put in charge of the operation to crush what Ben-Gurion described as an "open revolt."

Shots were fired from the shore, as ammunition cases on the Altalena detonated. A huge cloud of black smoke drifted up over the Altalena, an image photograped by Robert Cappa. By nightfall, the Irgun's casualties were 14 killed and 69 wounded. One of the fallen, Avraham Stavsky, had been acquitted of murdering Labor Zionist leader Haim Arlosoroff 15 years earlier. The IDF sustained two killed and six wounded.

The Altalena incident — a bloody microcosm of the ideological divisions within the broad Zionist movement — left a deep scar on Israel's body politic, a scar which has yet to heal.

But the wreckage of the Altalena is long gone. On Ben-Gurion's order, its remains were towed out to sea and sunk in a deep crevice of the Mediterranean, far from prying eyes.



Mideast Analysis

German ties with Israel

Thirty years ago last month, Israel and Germany (West Germany before unification in 1990) established diplomatic links after years of painstaking introspection and negotiations.

It is a relationship darkened by the past and brightened by the present.

The Holocaust is woven into Germany's very fabric. But, ironically, it is because of this unprecedented catastrophe that Israel's ties with Germany have been and still are unusually friendly.

As German Foreign Minister Klaus Kinkel put it at a recent exhibition in Bonn to mark the anniversary: "Our relations will always be special — more emotional, more sensitive than those between other countries."

In honor of the event, Israel and Germany have exchanged or intend to exchange high-level visits. Chancellor Helmut Kohl went to Israel last week, visiting Yad Vashem and promising to strengthen economic relations with Israel.

See related story page 36

Since May 1965, when Rolf Pauls took up his post as Germany's first ambassador to Israel, the ties binding the two nations have grown increasingly stronger on all levels.

Politically, Germany is Israel's chief ally in the European Union. Economically, Germany is Israel's second largest trade partner after the United States. Cultural, scientific and youth exchanges are thriving. Military cooperation exists (the German chief of staff has visited Israel). More than 80 cities and counties in Germany and Israel maintain partnerships.

In addition, Israel is the recipient of German aid — restitution payments and economic assistance in the order of billions of dollars since the 1950s.

In light of these facts, no one should be surprised that Israel's biggest embassy in Europe is found in Germany, and that one of Bonn's most important embassies in the Middle East is located in Tel Aviv.

Nevertheless, it would be fatuous to believe that all is sweetness and light. Israel's friendship with Germany, which Kinkel has described as "close to our hearts," has periodically been ruffled.

Israeli and German policies diverge on such basic Arab-Israeli questions as the status of Jerusalem, the disputed territories and Jewish settlements. And there have been nasty squabbles over the possible flow of advanced German weaponry to Saudi Arabia; the sale of dual-use technology to Libya and Iraq; and the upsurge of neo-Nazism in Germany (a phenomenon that prompted a call from an Israeli cabinet minister to withdraw Israel's envoy in Bonn).

Yet after three decades of peaks and valleys, Israel's relationship with Germany — the powerhouse of Europe — has settled into a reliable and stable mode. May it always remain so.

By RABBI JOSEPH KELMAN

There is a very interesting statement in classic Jewish literature that states, "everybody and everything needs mazal, even the sefer Torah in the Holy Ark." This means that if there is more than one sefer Torah the gabbai should arrange to alternate and make use of every Torah in the synagogue.

Similarly it can be said that the Jewish holidays in North America need mazal. Why is it that Pesach and the post-biblical holiday of Chanukah are celebrated much more than the recent holiday of Shavuot? There are many answers but I want to suggest one major one. Pesach, Chanukah and other holidays involve the whole family in the preparation and celebration.

Shavuot, of all the five biblical holidays and post-biblical ones, is the one lacking two major ingredients. The first, is that it has no special rituals for the individual Jew to do or participate in. Secondly, as we examine the Torah, we find that unlike the other festivals, there is no specific date mentioned for Shavuot. These two are interrelated.

Furthermore, in many synagogues there are more people in attendance on the second day of Shavuot, the last day of Pesach and Shemini Atzeret than on the first day. I never have criticized Jews who only come for Yiskor. On the contrary, if they come at least then, perhaps they will be inspired to come more often. However, this is indicative that the North American Jews over the past hundred years have made their own value judgment on what particular holiday or ritual they feel is important or necessary for them.

There are very good reasons why Shavuot deliberately has no date and/or rituals attached to it. Other holidays include a particular mitzvah or ritual, such as eating matzah on Pesach or lighting menorah candles on Chanukah. There is no obligation to do so the rest of the year.

Shavuot is called the time when we receive the gift of Torah, which called upon the Jew to make the Torah part of his life every single day. There is no special day when one is free from the obligation of observing the mitzvot or studying Torah. Thus, the message on Shavuot is to make it an intrinsic part of our daily lives.

A strong value judgment many Jews have made is that Jewish studies are for children and perhaps teenagers. However, many adults do not see it as a priority or an obligation. It is true that Judaism does not permit us to prioritize one mitzvah over another but nevertheless one of the most important mitzvot is not the words "you shall teach your children," but you must study yourself. We should not be vicarious Jews and be satisfied with other Jews who are studying Torah.

One of the fascinating changes in the Toronto Jewish community over the years has been the number of study programs available for people of all ages and backgrounds. The baal tshuvah movement has attracted thousands of young men and women who came to the conclusion after searching in other cultures, that there is a meaning, purpose and value in studying our own Torah.

This should not be limited only to young people who are looking for a meaning in life but to every single adult who will find meaning and enrich themselves by engaging in study. There are classes in every synagogue and many other institutions. There is a tremendous number of books and videos to meet the intellectual need of Jews in all walks of life. This all points out that Shavuot should not be celebrated only on the day itself but each and every day.

Scholars and laymen have to investigate more how we can inspire young people after leaving Hebrew school to continue as adults their lifelong love affair with Torah. There have been many studies on this. While the home is still the strongest influence in the Jewish development of a person, nevertheless it needs the ongoing influence of the Hebrew day and afternoon schools.

This January, I will be convening a conference at Tel Aviv University to examine the successes and perhaps the failures of North American and Israeli Hebrew school programs, which hopefully will be helpful to all of us engaged in making Jewish study a permanent feature of our adult life.

Newmarket woman enters Reform rabbinic school

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Newmarket resident has become the first Canadian convert to enter the Hebrew Union College's rabbinic school.

Lori Cohen, 37, is moving to Jerusalem with her three sons June 18, to begin the five-year Reform rabbi training program.

After the first year, she will complete the program at the Hebrew Union College's main campus in Cincinnati, Ohio. Her husband, Howard Cohen, is expected to join the family there.

"This is my passion," Cohen said, during a well-deserved break from packing and sorting. "I'm willing to change everything in my life to follow it."

Cohen, the driving force behind the 4-year-old Or Hadash synagogue in Newmarket, converted to Judaism 18 years ago after spending a year in Israel.

A special education teacher, she began the 58-student Hebrew school at Or Hadash, and has been leading services and teaching bar mitzvah students at the synagogue while studying Hebrew on her own in Toronto.

"I'm really going to put myself to the test with this one," she said over lunch recently.

She admitted to being scared by the prospect of moving her family to a strange city, but said sons Aaron, 13, Joshua, 7, and Daniel, 6, are looking forward to the move. Money will be tight, she said, but help has been offered to defray living costs and the $8,300 in tuition fees.

According to friend Ava Ross, Cohen is a fiercely determined woman who loves to study. She hopes Cohen will someday return to Or Hadash as rabbi. "She's definitely one of a kind."

Jewish camps in Russia

By YAKOV M. RABKIN

Since the collapse of the U.S.S.R., Jewish activists from several countries have flocked to develop essential Judaic institutions, including summer camps for children.

Having visited such camps in Russia, Ukraine, Belarus and Lithuania over the last few years, I have found a few common traits in all of them.

GUEST VOICES

Jewish children in the former U.S.S.R. are encouraged to strive for intellectual and artistic excellence as both a means of survival and an intrinsic value. Compared to their North American peers, they appear more serious and certainly more disciplined. However, most of them are far from Judaic knowledge and practice, albeit eager to find a way to articulate their Jewishness.

Since North American Jewish organizations usually provide most of the funds, it is natural that they tend to recreate in the former U.S.S.R. the atmosphere of North American summer camps. North American Jewish counsellors make little distinction between North American and Jewish elements in what they actually transmit. This is due to insufficient sensitization of North American counsellors to local cultures.

Indeed students of Orthodox Jewish schools rarely read about Russian culture, which is predominant among all Jewish children no matter which former Soviet republic they inhabit. Many counsellors are unfamiliar even with works on Soviet Jewish history written by Orthodox Jewish scholars such as Zvi Gitelman.

This unpreparedness creates a culture gap that prevents a meaningful dialogue from developing between the counsellors and their charges. Faute de mieux, the gap is often filled with songs and dances. Consequently, the cultural level of children in such camps has been on the decline. Jewish children from better educated families have been shifted to non-Jewish camps away from camps run by Orthodox North American Jews.

North American counsellors jump on chairs and lead children in American-accented Hebrew songs. They seat them on the floor and make them listen to stories in a mixture of Hebrew, Yiddish and English, often poorly rendered into Russian. All this appears utterly alien to most campers. Some develop sleep disorders after hours of hype, chanting and yelling. A few children even refuse to go to the dining room to eat lest they be forced to remain seated and sing in the midst of summer heat.

Counsellors in turn may keep the doors of the dining room locked, in order to, as they put it, "prevent escape." Counsellors rarely partake of the meals served in the camp and even more rarely hide their dislike for the food that campers have to eat, preferring to rely on food brought with them from North America. This leaves them time to sing during meals but also breeds resentment and thus reduces the efficacy of their otherwise admirable effort.

Russian Jews are reluctant to voice criticism and North Americans take their silent compliance as a sign of approval. The visitors often remark that Russia "still lives in the stone age" (plumbing is usually the yardstick of progress). Conversely, local Jews complain about North American Jewish counsellors as "uncultured and barbaric," and resent what they perceive as bossing on the part of their North American guests. Outpourings of mutual affection which usually accompany the departure of counsellors at the end of the season may hide the resentment, but there is little doubt it exists. My unique vantage point is that members of both groups open their hearts to me, taking me for "one of their own."

North American Jewish organizations should consolidate their support of summer camps in the former U.S.S.R. To make these camps less abrasive to local children, Jewish educators from Russia or other European countries should assume operational responsibility for the organization and running of the camps. Programming must be approved in advance and a few foreign emissaries may be sent in to ensure conformity with basic Judaic law and with the program guidelines, as well as to teach more advanced classes of Judaica.

These emissaries must know Russian and some of them may be recruited from among many observant Jews of Russian/Soviet provenance residing in North America, Europe or Israel. This modus operandi will be more cost-effective, culturally appropriate and above all, more efficacious in terms of transmission of Judaic knowledge and practice to post-Soviet Jews. This, rather than the edifying and entertainment value of Russian trips for North American Jewish counsellors, must be taken as the main purpose and criterion of success for Jewish camps in the former U.S.S.R.

Yakov Rabkin teaches at the University of Montreal and also prepares Western professionals for training and other missions in the former U.S.S.R.

Netivot Hatorah marks 10th year

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When a small group of parents met some 10 years ago and decided to establish a central Orthodox, religious Zionist elementary school, no one thought they had any chance of succeeding.

A gala dinner held recently at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto celebrated the fact that they did succeed, that Netivot Hatorah, which began as a group of 30 students in a classroom at Temple Sinai, has grown to a student body of 500, housed in its own Thornhill facility.

The dinner also paid tribute to school benefactors Bill and Judy Rubinstein, Eugene and Lilly Sandorfy and Jack and Anne Weinbaum.

A tearful Shauna Tepperman, the first president of the school, applause sometimes drowning out her words, thanked the honorees (all Holocaust survivors) for "responding to devastation by guaranteeing their grandchildren would have a school like this. Through their generosity, our dreams are a reality," she said.

Master of ceremonies Moishe Kesten, the current Netivot president, emphasized that the school was founded by the "grassroots" — the parents — and was helped by funding from the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

He praised the honorees as "activists for Jewish community causes here and in Israel," noted for their "humility and dignity."

In his d'var Torah, school principal Rabbi Avi Schochet urged the over 500 in attendance to remember that whatever problems may exist in the State of Israel, "it's our Jewish state," and that Jews treasure the memory of the Hasmonean kingdom of the second century CE because "it was a Jewish government, no matter how corrupt they were."

Joseph Burg, president of World Mizrachi and chair of the International Committee of Yad Vashem, brought greetings "from all the national religious school children [in Israel], from the gan [kindergarten] to Bar-Ilan University."

He said it is dangerous to overemphasize technological advances while ignoring moral growth.

"The world fears atomic, biological and chemical warfare. We have our ABCs too — Auschwitz, Bergen-Belsen, Chelmno — all the way to Westerbork and Zyklon-B gas."

A video, produced and directed by Renee Rubinstein, daughter-in-law of one of the couples honored, told the story of the school.

The honorees responded through their children, Eli Rubinstein, Sybil Sandorfy Herahtal, and Allan Weinbaum.

'Awesome Foursome' honored at Bonds brunch

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — Irving Taylor has a simple formula for deciding which causes to support.

"You're better to give a little to every cause," he says. "We say 'yes' to everybody in case we might miss one of the charities that might be very important."

Taylor and his wife Ethel were recently honored, along with his brother Chick and sister-in-law Rose, by Israel Bonds at a gala champagne brunch.

Dubbed by event chair Rabbi Reuven Bulka as the "Awsome Foursome," the two couples insisted the usual pricey dinner be replaced by a more modest brunch to allow for more Israel Bonds to be purchased.

The Taylors have been lifelong volunteers and donors in Ottawa. They have held leadership positions, chairing events such as the UJA campaign, and attracted new blood to their causes.

"My first of many UJA pledges came in Chick and Rose's basement after a tearful and passionate speech about why it was important to give to Ottawa and Israel," recalled Morris Presser, a board member of Canada Israel Securities Ltd. who is heavily involved in community work.

Ethel and Rose said they get more out of donating their time than they put in.

"You meet so many different people in life that you wouldn't normally meet if you didn't get involved with these things," Ethel said. "I just enjoy it. I couldn't live any other way."

"When you're doing something very worthwhile you just don't get tired," Rose agreed. "It buoys you up."

Encouraging their friends to invest in Israel Bonds, Chick said it is especially important now that Ottawa and several other Canadian cities are thinking of cutting back the amount of United Jewish Appeal money they send to Israel.

"Because of the shortfall of money Israel is not going to receive, we feel that it is more important then ever that we increase our purchases of Israel Bonds," Chick said.

First Nations group to sponsor kiddush

VICTORIA — The Nuh-Chai-Nu'uth First Nations will sponsor a Shabbat kiddush June 24 at Congregation Emanu-El in honor of Mark Krasnick, who died here recently at age 45.

Krasnick, a lawyer, was chief treaty negotiator with native groups on behalf of the province.

Rabbi Victor Reinstein said the native community "recognized and responded to the empathy for their cause arising from Mark's Jewish heritage. They trusted him, enabling development of a just and honorable treaty process."

Krasnick is survived by his wife, Arlene Zuckernick, son Jared and mother Ruth.

Shaarey Zedek's rabbi 'going home' to Chicago

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — After six years as spiritual leader of the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, Rabbi Henry Balser is "going home."

On July 1, he will be assuming the leadership of Congregation Ezra-Habonim in Chicago. Although originally from New York, he says he lived in Chicago for a number of years after he finished university and that some of his closest friends live there.

Rabbi Balser leaves a legacy of accomplishment behind him in Winnipeg. The Conservative-Egalitarian Shaarey Zedek in south Winnipeg is the city's oldest, as well as its largest, congregation, with over 1,000 member families.

When Rabbi Balser arrived in the fall of 1989, regular Shabbat services generally attracted some 40 of the older congregants. As a result of his efforts, however, up to 200 people of all ages attend almost every Shabbat.

One of his early and most popular innovations was to do away with the usual sermon, in favor of a dialogue between the rabbi and his congregation.

Working closely with Perle Flam Selch, the synagogue's executive director (who is also leaving in November), and with the board and the office staff, Rabbi Balser has helped introduce new programs for all age groups.

During his time in Winnipeg, Rabbi Balser has shown himself to be a man who is unafraid to take strong — although not always popular — public stands on community issues. Most recently, he has been involved in controversies involving the absence of Yiddish in the Winnipeg Jewish school system (he is unsentimental about the absence of the language) and Jewish homosexuality (he takes a conservative rather than a liberal stance).

"I don't expect everyone to agree with me," he says. "If everyone did agree with everything I said, I would think I was doing something wrong."

He says he is looking forward to working with a smaller congregation. (Congregation Ezra-Habonim has a membership of about 350 families.)

"There won't be as many life cycle events for me to officiate at," he says. "All the weddings, bar mitzvahs and funerals at the Shaarey Zedek I found were draining. At Ezra-Habonim, I will be able to spend more time teaching and using my energy in other areas."

At the Shaarey Zedek, though, Rabbi Balser will be missed. His colleagues, co-workers and congregants have nothing but praise for him and regret his decision to leave.

Yiddish program for children

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Faye Kellerstein's concern that Yiddish might become extinct led her to create a program of Yiddish folk and theatre songs for children.

Kellerstein, a Yiddish singer/educator, has assembled Kid-Dush for Yiddish, which will perform in concert at the Fairview Library Theatre June 22 at 7:30 p.m.

"I want the children to be able to relate to Yiddish songs, some of which were written a hundred years ago," Kellerstein said. Many songs have been updated.

With musical director Jordan Klapman, Kellerstein will lead the 15 children in song and anecdotes.

"The Yiddish language," she said, "is the most colorful language I know."

It is her hope that the group will someday tour other communities.

For more information, call Kellerstein at 416-633-6558.

Associated program helps students learn to read

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Young students at Associated Hebrew Schools who are having trouble learning to read will get help from a new venture.

Operation Reading Boost will be in place in September at the three operating Associated branches — Leslie Danilak, Atkinson Kamin and Finch Hurwich.

(The Neptune branch is scheduled for demolition. A smaller version will be built on the site.)

Hurwich branch general studies principal Sandy Rabinowitz told The CJN that reading is seen as one of the skills essential to effective learning.

Operation Reading Boost will "give an intensive push to reading skills" in senior kindergarten and grades 1 and 2, Rabinowitz said.

A reading specialist will go into the classroom for a certain number of hours each week ("the exact number depends on available funds"). He or she will work with the teacher to identify children at risk of developing reading problems and will institute a program, plan necessary modifications to classroom procedures and work with the children.

Depending on how the program develops and on the needs of the child, Rabinowitz said, there may also be remedial and withdrawal help, or a resource teacher made available.

Rabinowitz has drawn on programs existing elsewhere, such as the Scarborough Reading Recovery program, for ideas.

"What is common to all these programs is that if you give lots of attention, you have a better chance of getting a kid into the reading mode early. That will make it easier for him to continue in the system."

This is not intended to deal with actual learning disabilities, Rabinowitz noted, although, he said, "It will hopefully identify children who will need special education."

The intention, he said, "is to get kids off to a good start."

Operation Reading Boost came about at the instigation of the Vaad Hachinuch of Associated, who wanted to ensure that children faced with the difficulties of a double program would get all the help they need to remain in the day school system.

Funding is coming from the operating budget of the school and is projected at $62,000 for capital costs and an initial operating cost of about $85,000.

Randy Spiegel, coordinator of capital projects and public relations for Associated, calls Operation Reading Boost "a cutting edge program."

It will not only benefit the child with problems, he says, but "can bump a kid who is just doing OK to a higher level."

Vancouver Island students, teachers study Holocaust

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — More than 1,100 high school students and teachers from 21 schools in lower Vancouver Island recently spent a day learning the facts about the Holocaust at the University of Victoria.

It was the third annual Holocaust symposium, but the first attended by students outside the Greater Victoria area.

The symposium was sponsored and hosted by the university's faculties of law and history. History professor Phyllis Senese chaired the event.

The students heard from and questioned survivors, a Righteous Gentile who hid a Jewish family in his native Holland, and two German-Canadians who discussed, Could It Happen Again?

The students asked survivors "How could you stand it? Why didn't you give up? How did you keep going?"

Peter Gary, who had been in Bergen-Belsen, replied: "We had anger, fatigue, even thought of suicide. But somehow we kept going and stayed alive."

Round of applause

Gary, who is chairman of the local Holocaust Society, said the symposia prepare students "for life. Your future depends on the life you build here."

Syrt Wolters, the Righteous Gentile, was given a big round of applause.

German-born Tom Bredohl, of the university's history department, and syndicated newspaper columnist Hubert Bayer spoke about the need to remember the Holocaust.

Ken McVay and Rick Kool, who monitor and fight racism on the Internet, showed examples of the kind of hate material sent out via computer.

"If you see something on the Net that bothers you, try to negate it," McVay advised. He has been awarded the Order of British Columbia for his work in fighting hate on the Internet.

Students of Victoria High read an act from the Holocaust play, Keeping the Memory.

The students were welcomed to the symposium by rabbi Victor Reinstein, and he thanked them for attending.

Teachers were asked to make suggestions for an anti-racism program to be presented for inclusion in the province's school curriculum.

Splinter party in the offing

The central committee ballot followed a speech by Netanyahu severely attacking factionalism and laying the blame for the party's 1992 defeat squarely at Levy's door.

For his part, Levy accused Netanyahu of having "unleashed unbridled incitement of the lowest imaginable form against a veteran member of this party and against his veteran colleagues."

Netanyahu used "every possible vituperation to express unmitigated hate," Levy said.

Despite last week's angry words — the latest in Levy's ongoing battle with arch-rival Netanyahu — it remains unclear whether Levy will follow through and launch his own party.

Much of that guesswork could be cleared up this Sunday, when Levy is scheduled to lay out his detailed plans at a mass meeting for his followers from across the country.

But it's not clear what impact Levy's secession would have on the 1996 elections.

For the first time next year, Israelis will hold direct elections for prime minister.

And even though recent polls indicate that Netanyahu would defeat Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin in those elections, a survey released last Friday suggested that Netanyahu would lose to Rabin if Levy seceded from Likud.

But even if Levy does not call for a secession from Likud, he could decide not to help turn out the vote for Likud among his supporters, most of whom come from a Sephardi, working-class background and whose votes would be crucial to Netanyahu's victory.

This is not the first time Levy has played the game of brinkmanship with Netanyahu.

Similar claims of exclusion came from the Levy camp in the wake of Likud's internal elections in 1991 and nearly resulted in a party split.

Indeed, a leading political columnist, Hanna Kim of the Israeli daily Ha'aretz, dubbed the present rift a "late divorce," directly linking the earlier confrontation to the current hostilities.

Levy, preferring to keep his tactical plans close to his chest, stopped short of announcing his immediate secession from the party this week.

As a result, key Netanyahu supporters maintained that this left space for an 11th-hour compromise.

But many observers believe the die is cast. The split is now a fact of political life and what remains is to see what sort of political strength Levy can gather around his projected new party.

Part of Levy's tactical problems relate to his status in the current Knesset. Because of the drubbing his camp took in Likud's 1991 internal elections, most of Levy's close lieutenants failed to make it into the current Knesset.

In fact, he can only count on one serving Knesset member, Dan Tichon, to break away with him from the present Likud faction.

But under Knesset rules, a breakaway faction needs the support of at least one-third of the members of the mother party in order to be entitled to state financing.

Other possible allies include disgruntled Likud Liberals such as Moshe Nissim, who was also a senior minister in past Likud governments.

A new, Levy-led party would presumably adopt a rightist platform — though a more moderate one than the Likud's.

Levy has long been regarded as a voice of moderation within the Likud, as his record as a minister over the years reflects.

On the eve of the September 1982 massacre at the Sabra and Shatila refugee camp in Lebanon, for example, Levy was the only cabinet minister to urge that the Israel Defence Force take control of areas held by the Lebanese Christians who carried out the massacre.

Military level talks resume

Christopher also announced that along with the military talks, negotiations would resume between the Israeli and Syrian ambassadors on non-military issues.

The secretary offered a highly optimistic assessment of the prospects for a deal on the Israeli-Syrian track.

"I think that this trip has reinforced my feeling that there is a tremendous opportunity to move now toward a goal of a comprehensive peace, perhaps a better opportunity than at any time during the 2½ years that I have been in office," he said.

Christopher also announced that U.S. President Bill Clinton was willing to return to the region if his presence would help move the long-troubled talks forward.

Students use Internet to talk to survivors

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Survivors' personal reminiscences are the best tool Joe Alessandro has to teach non-Jewish students in rural Ontario about the Holocaust.

There are no Jews in and around Walsingham, Ont., a village of a few hundred people about 60 km southeast of London, so Alessandro's Grade 7 current events class at Walsingham Public School is using the Internet to talk to survivors.

After posting queries, the 25 kids found three survivors on the global computer network, and together with standard texts and some milder scenes from Schindler's List, have pieced together their first glimpse of the Holocaust.

"At first, there was disbelief and anger," Alessandro told The CJN in a telephone interview from Walsingham, just north of Lake Erie, in the heart of Ontario's tobacco farming country. "But one thing that has impressed me was their maturity level. They've gotten fairly deeply into it."

This has been the second year Alessandro has taught the Holocaust. His class of 12- and 13-year-old students includes "about seven or eight German kids. But we've received no negative feedback at all. I've had great support from the principal and parents are solidly behind us."

The Internet led Alessandro's class to Harold Gordon of Salinas, Cal., a survivor of Buchenwald and author of The Last Sunrise, a book of his wartime recollections; a survivor of Auschwitz who now lives in Melbourne, Australia, and another Auschwitz survivor in Israel.

Chatting with the three has had "a tremendous impact" on the students. "It gives them an immediate sense of what happened."

But the Internet's darker side hasn't been ignored. Alessandro says the students have also tapped into the network's wealth of Holocaust denial material freely available to anyone.

Their reaction to that, their teacher notes, was, 'Oh yeah. These people [the survivors] just made the whole thing up.' "

In all, Alessandro's Holocaust class "has evoked the most passion of any subject I teach."

Writing contest winners named

TORONTO — Six young Toronto students were honored recently for their winning entries in the second annual Provincial Writing Contest on the Holocaust.

Junior division winners were Basima Roshan, Humber Valley Middle School, North York, Grade 7; Carmia Bitzan, Grade 7 at Cummer Valley Middle School in North York; and Caitlin Mills, Linden School, North York, Grade 8.

Winners in the senior division, were Gillian Perera, St. Joseph's Collegiate School, Toronto, Grade 11; Emily Chung, St. Clement's School, Toronto, OAC; and Anita Brinkman, Chatham Christian High School, Grade 10.

The contest was sponsored by the youth for youth subcommittee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, under the leadership of students Laura Jacob from the University of Toronto and Amy Stork of Thornhill Secondary School.

Over 100 entered the province-wide writing contest, which was on the topic: What are the lessons of the Holocaust for Canadians today?

The judges were Prof. Adam Fuerstenberg, Ryerson Polytechnical University; Malka Rosenberg, anti-racism consultant for the Ontario Anti-Racism Secretariat; Harold Lass, head of the English Department at Northern Secondary School; Morry Patt, retired superintendent of the North York Board of Education; and Prof. Jacques Kornberg, University of Toronto.

Russian Mousse with Strawberry Sauce Serves 6-8
Mousse: 1 envelope unflavored gelatin; 1/4 cup water, cold; 3 egg yolks; 1/3 cup sugar; 1 cup milk, hot; 1 tsp pure vanilla extract; 1 cup sour cream (preferably Astra); 1 cup whipping cream; 1/4 cup strawberries; 1/4 cup sugar
Sauce: 1 L strawberries
Mousse: Sprinkle gelatine over water in small saucepan. Allow to soften 5 min. Beat egg yolks with sugar in saucepan. Beat in hot milk. Heat gelatine mixture gently, stir until dissolved. Stir into yolk mixture, cook over low heat until slightly thickened, about 5 min. Stir in vanilla & sour cream. Cool until mixture reaches room temperature. Beat whipping cream until soft peaks form. Fold cream quickly into sour cream base. Pour into 3-cup/750-mL mould. Cover with plastic wrap, refrigerate for few hours or overnight. Save few nice berries for garnish. Puree remaining berries with sugar. Before serving, run knife around outside of mould and invert onto serving plate. Slice into wedges. Serve with sauce under or poured over mousses. Garnish with reserved berries.

Jerusalem Pavilion returns to Bloor JCC for Caravan

TORONTO — Many Toronto residents have their first taste of Israel at the Jerusalem Pavilion of the annual multi-cultural Festival Caravan.

An estimated 10,000 visitors will browse in this year's shuk, sample Israeli delicacies and take in musical performances at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre from June 17 to 24.

Indoor entertainment will be provided daily by the award-winning Jerusalem Dancers under artistic choreographer Rivka Atzmony and the Neimot singers led by musical director Doron Ophir.

A rooftop garden will feature musicians and singers directed by Ted Lebow.

A slide show featuring 800 shots of Israel will capture the country's beauty from north to south.

A Jerusalem pavilion menu, including falafel, hummus, Mitzli juice and the "Jerusalem Spritzer," has been prepared by Caterers York Ltd.

Limore Twena is the pavilion princess, and longtime pavilion volunteer Len Berk is this year's mayor. Monty Mazin is serving as honorary chair and mayor.

Hours for the pavilion are June 17, motzei Shabbat to 1 a.m.; June 18, 3 p.m. to 11 p.m.; June 19 to 22, 6:30 p.m. to 11 p.m.; and June 24, motzei Shabbat to 1 a.m. The pavilion is closed on Friday, June 23.

The Bloor JCC is located at 750 Spadina Ave., just south of Bloor.

As in past years, the pavilion is being sponsored by B'nai Brith Canada. Air Canada, which is initiating non-stop flights to Israel from Toronto as of this month, is the "Platinum" sponsor.

Passports, good for entrance to all 40 Caravan pavilions, may be purchased at any Bank of Montreal, from B'nai Brith Canada, or at the Caravan office (977-0466). During the festival, passports are available at all pavilions. The price is $14 for the entire festival, $7 for a one-day passport. Admission is free for children 12 and under.

Seniors, adults, children and dogs participated in this year's Baycrest Challenge. Keeping the pace on the right is Baycrest CEO Stephen W. Herbert.

Baycrest Challenge draws close to 2,000

TORONTO — Close to 2,000 children, adults, seniors and dogs trekked through the streets of North York for this year's Baycrest Challenge, held May 14.

The challenge, in its 15th year, is expected to raise more than $100,000 for Alzheimer's disease research and a pet visiting program at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

Paul Barron and Elaine Coburn won the five-kilometre run, and Nick Tsioris and Laura Konantz won the 10-kilometre run. Also participating were 400 members of the Mon Sheong Foundation of Toronto's Chinese community, with special guest Toronto Mayor Barbara Hall.

Goldbloom named chancellor of TUNS

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritimes Correspondent

HALIFAX — Several months ago, Ruth Goldbloom was invited to be chancellor of Technical University of Nova Scotia (TUNS) in Halifax. She took some time deciding whether to accept.

"I am a low-tech woman and this was a hi-tech university," she laughed, adding she agonized about what she could contribute to Nova Scotia's only engineering school.

She accepted the post last December, however, and is to be installed on May 10.

Born in New Waterford, N.S., educated at Mount Allison University in Sackville, N.B., and at McGill University, Goldbloom has been a mainstay of the Halifax and Atlantic communities since returning to her native province a couple of decades ago.

When she is installed as TUNS' fourth chancellor, she will add to a resume that includes three other university board appointments, an honorary degree and service in countless community organizations.

"I accepted the TUNS' position when I looked back at the opportunities my mother never had," Goldbloom said. "She left the Soviet Union and came to Glace Bay when she was 12. She had been eligible for high academic achievement in the Soviet Union but Jews were not allowed to pursue them. To her, education was always important and I feel the same way. We must make it available to everyone."

Goldbloom, who served on the boards of Mount Allison University and Mount St. Vincent University in Halifax and chaired fundraising drives at Dalhousie University (from which she holds an honorary degree), said she has several goals as chancellor at TUNS. A former chairman of the board at Mount St. Vincent, which numbers mostly women among its students, she wants to increase the female registration in TUNS' engineering, architecture and computer science programs, by speaking to alumni groups and high school counsellors and developing programs to bring high school students to visit the TUNS' campus.

"I also want to develop a commitment from undergraduates and alumni to their university. We know government money is drying up and we'll look more and more to our own people for support."

She said it's important to let undergrads know the cost of educating them, "which, I hope, will increase their commitment to the university."

Goldbloom said there is no job description for a chancellor, which in some cases, is strictly a ceremonial role.

"I can't do that. I don't get my kicks from that," said the woman who chaired the Metro Halifax United Way, headed a Mount St. Vincent fund drive and was national chair for Dalhousie's annual fund.

When asked the length of the term, Goldbloom said, "It's for three years. At my age, I don't even buy green bananas."

Benefits of peace lauded by WZO chair

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Though terror and violence have cast a shadow over the peace process, the benefits of peace are evident in Israel, maintains the chair of the World Zionist Organization and Jewish Agency delegation to the United States.

Gad Ben-Ari, a lawyer and broadcaster, took the New York position last summer. A sixth-generation Sabra, Ben-Ari traces his roots in Israel to the early 1800s, when his family left Poland for what was then Palestine.

During a recent two-day visit to Toronto, Ben-Ari,43, noted that Israel is experiencing "a tremendous [economic] boom.

"As a result of the peace treaty with Jordan, Israel has established relations with Morocco and Tunisia. We have established close ties with Arab gulf countries [such as] Quatar, Bahrain and Oman. The fruits of peace are already very much there, and we are only at the beginning of the process."

Ben-Ari is confident Israel is moving in the right direction, despite "setbacks, tremendous hardships and high emotions."

He is heartened by the peace-related concerns raised by Diaspora Jews he has met. "I think it's wonderful to meet people who care."

A strong believer in the need for a continuing relationship between Israelis and Diaspora Jews, Ben-Ari believes fundraising is a "central element" in creating that link. It should be based less on the notion of philanthropy, however, and more on that of partnership, he stressed. "Philanthropy is based on need; partnership on commitment."

Life cycle rituals part of Jewish life

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although references to Jewish life cycle rituals such as brit millah, baby naming and bar/bat mitzvah are minimal in the Bible, such rituals have become an increasingly significant part of Jewish life today.

"Religion in North America has become a public experience," explained leading Jewish feminist Norma Joseph at a recent gathering.

The Montreal scholar was the final speaker in the Perspectives series of the Young Leadership Network of United Jewish Appeal, held at a number of Toronto homes. She also spoke about agunot at a UJA Women's Campaign meeting.

"The life cycle ritual is important because it's ... another way of the community saying, 'Welcome, you're part of us.' " For the celebrant, it's "a chance to show [the] community that being a Jew counts," Joseph said.

Joseph equated life cycle rituals with Jewish continuity, even when the emphasis is more on the party than on the religious content. "Somewhere there's room to begin to inject that tie that binds them with God and community.

"All those rituals become more important in the modern period because of the shift from the [shtetl] community to individuals and a secular world. Maybe my great-grandmother didn't need these opportunities. She had a different way of hooking in."

And as rituals became more commonplace, gender difference became more pronounced, Joseph pointed out. "Women said, 'What about me?' "

These days, women in every denomination of Judaism are acknowledged as public Jews at the time they become bat mitzvah, Joseph said.

Interestingly, although the status of bar mitzvah was mentioned in the Talmud, which was finished around the year 500 CE, there is no known mention of a bar mitzvah celebration before the 1500s, Joseph said.

The bat mitzvah ceremony has its roots in 19th-century Germany and in Baghdad, Joseph said, where a local rabbi had a 12-year-old girl recite the Shehechiyanu prayer to mark her coming of age.

For Jewish life cycle rituals to involve women is "not radical; it's rational."

CJN Rosh Hashanah Photo Contest

The CJN announces its Rosh Hashanah photo contest. We are asking our readers to submit photographs either of Israel or of any Jewish theme in their communities. They must be original photos taken by the reader.

Who can enter:
Anyone can enter except CJN employees or members of their family.

How to enter:
A maximum of three photos per entrant may be submitted. Please place your name, address and phone number on the back of each photo. We can only return the photos if you provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. We cannot be responsible however for any photos lost in the mail.

You may mail or deliver your photos to:
CJN Rosh Hashanah Contest, The Canadian Jewish News, 10 Gateway Blvd., Suite 420, Don Mills, Ontario, M3C 3A1.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on August 18, 1995.

Prizes:
The judges will choose the three photographs which, in their opinion, are most evocative.

The winning submissions will be published in The CJN Rosh Hashanah issue. In addition, each of the winners will receive a cheque for $100.

We will undoubtedly receive many worthy submissions. But only three will be selected as the winners. We will also select other photographs for publication as honorable mentions. The decisions of the judges will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and the quality of submissions received.

How the winners will be notified:
Winning entrants will be notified by telephone before the start of the Shabbat on Friday, August 25.

When the prizes will be awarded:
The winning photos will be published in The CJN of Sept. 21.

We look forward to receiving your submissions. May the camera's eye capture the stirrings of your heart. Good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Yiddish Concert at Earl Bales: For 14 consecutive years, a concert of Yiddish folk music has been held outdoors at Earl Bales Park, at the southeast corner of Sheppard Avenue and Bathurst Street, North York. This year's concert, presented as usual by the Committee for Yiddish, is scheduled for Monday June 26 at 7 p.m. Admission is free.

As in years past, the concert promises to provide an evening of authentic, lively Yiddish music. Stella Walker, a Vancouver soprano who is a popular comedy cabaret and opera performer in Toronto, headlines with a selection of Yiddish folk songs. Moscow-born baritone Leonid Karpinsky, Israeli musician Yossi Abramowich and his band, and the Zemer Choral of the Beth Emeth Synagogue, directed by Charles Heller, are also slated to perform.

Everyone is welcome to this event, and concertgoers are advised to bring chairs and blankets from home. Public transportation is recommended. Rain location is Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, 100 Elder St., North York. For information, call Sylvia Lustgarten, 635-2883 ext. 155.

Award-Winning Clarinetist in Performance: The Sinai Musical Legacy Award is presented annually by Temple Sinai to a talented young Jewish musician at the threshold of his or her career. This year's winner, Shalom Bard, is a brilliant young clarinetist and the assistant conductor of the Oakville Symphony Orchestra.

Born in Haifa, Bard, 21, arrived in Canada four years ago and is currently enrolled in the Performing Arts program at the Faculty of Music of the University of Toronto. He has performed as soloist with the Toronto Symphony and the Toronto Symphony Youth Orchestra, and has won many awards and scholarships as both a performer and a conductor.

Hear Shalom Bard perform, accompanied by pianist Jennie Jong, at Temple Sinai, 210 Wilson Ave., Toronto, Wednesday June 14, 8 p.m. 487-4161.

Barbara Hepworth Retrospective at AGO: Miles Nadal, president and CEO of MDC Corporation, has taken up the challenge that Gluskin Sheff sent out during its sponsorship of the Barnes Collection of fine impressionist paintings last year at the Art Gallery of Ontario. Nadal is the sponsor of the Barbara Hepworth Retrospective that opened in late May at the AGO and remains on view until August 7.

Born in 1958 and educated at three Ontario universities, Nadal opened a photography studio in 1980, and saw the potential for a company that could provide a wide range of integrated marketing and communications services. Today, MDC is a publicly-traded company that boasts more than 350 employees and annual revenues of close to $100 million.

Nadal is married to the former Joanne Fogler and has two daughters. He sits on the board of directors for Mount Sinai Hospital and chairs its Young Leadership program. He is also a director of the United Jewish Appeal executive committee and of the Canadian Weizmann Institute of Science.

Riot At Christie Pits — The Movie: A documentary about Toronto's infamous riot at Christie Pits began production this month. Produced by Breakthrough Films and Television Inc., the made-for-TV documentary is intended to vividly portray the racial tensions and social climate of Depression-era Toronto that culminated in the riot that involved some 10,000 people on August 16, 1933.

The intent of the filmmakers is to draw parallels between attitudes towards minorities in the 1930s and today. Participants in the production include former boxer and community leader Sammy Luftspring, former crime reporter Jocko Thomas, and Dr. Cyril Levitt, co-author of the book about the riots that received wide attention several years ago.

Producers of the documentary are Ira Levy and Peter Williamson, creators of the children's show The Adventures of Dudley the Dragon and other programs. A dramatic re-enactment is set for shooting at the end of June. For information or to attend the shoot, contact The Publicity House, 323-1500.

Investment in Israel called lucrative

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — A New York investment banker who helped raise $1.5 billion for 20 Israeli companies over the past 3½ years spoke at a luncheon held by the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce and Industry recently.

Just before the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange (TASE) decline that followed the Mexican currency crisis, the companies he took public had a higher stock price growth rate than any other group on U.S. exchanges, said Harvey Krueger, senior managing director of Lehman Brothers Inc. About 60 Israeli companies are currently traded in New York.

Lately the interest of U.S. investors in developing countries has waned, but Krueger predicted that "less known markets like Israel will again begin to be more and more attractive," since stock markets are cyclical.

Israeli companies that successfully sold their stocks internationally are technologically advanced, profitable and mostly export oriented, said Krueger.

He said the Israeli government played a part in helping them attract international capital by providing loans and grants to build communications and transportation links, as well as by reducing inflation and introducing a stable tax policy.

"When tax policy was unstable, domestic and foreign investment interest was unreliable," he said.

Israel's free trade agreements with the United States and the European Common Market make it possible to have three-way, tariff-free business arrangements, Krueger said, and stock exchange regulations that ensure disclosure in a manner consistent with world standards "permit investor confidence."

Experiencing rapid growth

Israeli industries now compete effectively with leading international companies and Israel is one of the 12 most developed countries in the world, he said. "It's gone in 10 years from a country in a lot of trouble to a successful, developed growing country."

Technically, Israel is no longer an emerging-market country, but what it does have in common with such countries is rapid growth. Israel expects growth of 5 per cent again in 1996, unemployment is down to 7.8 per cent and investment makes up 23½ per cent of gross domestic product, Krueger noted. The TASE has 638 companies listed and last year generated $27.2 billion in volume.

The economies of mature nations such as the United States no longer dominate the world economic scene, he said, adding that Israel has a growth rate almost twice that of the U.S.

Israel now has an investment grade credit rating of BBB+ (triple B plus), and if not for the recent disruption in emerging markets, it would be an A- (A minus) or an A, he said.

Despite the good economic news, Krueger confessed he is not a Pollyanna about Israel because "everything is not rosy." Inflation, which had been moving steadily downward since the mid '80s to as low as under 10 per cent in 1993, rose to 14½ per cent in 1994.

As for the peace process, he stressed that investors in the Middle East will take political risk into account, so that "stability in the political environment is subsequently more important than sympathies in choosing sides."

After years of hostility, far too little thought has been given to normalizing economic relations within the region, he said.

Businesspeople in the Mideast, rather than governments, are starting to work together to improve the living standards there, he said, citing recent Israeli private sector joint ventures with Egyptian and Jordanian companies.

"They have broken ground and the governments will probably wait for the peace process to be finished. Private capital is an instrument, if used effectively, to foster the peace process, not thwart it."

SUPPORTING THE PEACE PROCESS IS VITAL TO ISRAEL'S FUTURE

to its security, to its prosperity and to its Jewish traditions.

We support the Israeli government's vigorous efforts to fight terrorism and negotiate a lasting framework of security and normalization with its Palestinian and Arab neighbours. To continue the occupation could further inflame Palestinian terrorism. It could lead to another bloody war in the Middle East and it could erode the Jewishness of the State of Israel and its democratic traditions. Consolidating the peace process offers Israel the best course of action in the long term. The risks and costs are significant, but without it, the threats to Israel and its citizens would be infinitely greater. The peace process makes use of the political option while preserving the military one. It supports Israel's need for security, reinforcing the Jewish traditions of justice and the pursuit of peace. The process gains Israel international support and credibility.

The opportunities in the peace process far outweigh its dangers, and its failure will lead to a raging inferno throughout the Middle East. The consolidation of the peace process is an imperative for the Jewish people.

Partnership helps brain scan analysis

By CELINE MIGDAL
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — A unique link between a Canadian and Israeli company to develop the best use of neural network technology for brain scan analysis was announced recently by Dr. Henri Rothschild, president of Canada-Israel Industrial Research & Development Foundation (CIIRDF).

Rothschild, former chief scientist of Industry Canada, said the agreement to fund the feasibility venture between International Neural Machines Inc. (INM) of Waterloo, Ont., and Elscint Ltd. of Haifa, Israel, is the first of its kind for Canada and holds great promise for technical innovation that will benefit both countries.

"There's interesting potential in this initiative," said Rothschild. "This is a strong team with a good mix of expertise."

In 1994, Elscint Ltd. celebrated 25 years in medical imaging systems based on computer technology. Elscint successfully develops, manufactures and markets this technology internationally.

INM, incorporated in Ontario in 1990, is a pioneer in the field of neural network technology and its application to medical diagnostics and decision support systems. It develops software and hardware used for character recognition and speech synthesis.

The INM-Elscint joint project will focus on developing the best use of neural network technology for brain scan analysis and interpretation of Single Photon Emission Computerized Tomography (SPECT) images.

This will not only help to better understand brain functions, it will also help control costs in providing these services by health care providers and administrators. Medical researchers from the Department of Radiological Sciences, Mount Sinai Hospital of Toronto, will also collaborate in the project.

"We're not aware of any other binational groups applying similar techniques to CT brain scans," said Rothschild. "Should this study yield positive results, we fully expect to support a full-scale joint R&D effort by INM and Elscint."

CIIRDF was established in 1994 to provide highly specialized research and development between Canadian and Israeli companies on joint projects. CIIRDF provides 50 per cent of development costs. If the project proves successful and commercially viable, the contribution will be repaid by the two partners from the profits.

"A Canada-Israel research partnership makes good sense," Rothschild said. Israel's scientific prowess is recognized globally and its eight universities provide a well-trained and eager source of young technical "wizards." He said there is no doubt the quality of research in Israel's universities is top-drawer.

As for quantity, "Israel's overall rate of investment in research and development is, as a percentage of gross domestic product, more than double that of Canada," Rothschild said. "Israel has become the economic Singapore of the Middle East — all the economic indicators, particularly in R&D and science, point that way."

Israelis attracted to Hong Kong

By RACHEL ALKALLAY
Special to The CJN

HONG KONG — The glamor capital of the Far East has attracted business worldwide — and Israel is no exception.

Israel's consul general to Hong Kong, Zohar Raz, has made the city his base since December 1994 although he is also accredited to the tiny Portuguese enclave of Macao, across the waters.

The staff at the Israeli consulate which is almost entirely Chinese, does not speak Hebrew and the Israelis do not speak Chinese. But as is common in Hong Kong, everything functions smoothly in English.

Raz expresses great admiration for Hong Kong and its industrious population of an estimated six million, who live and work peacefully on a mere 1,074 square kilometres. He notes how Hong Kong has blossomed as an economic power while occupying a tiny area of land on the tip of the Chinese mainland and with the constant looming presence of Communist China.

A large proportion of Hong Kong's Jewish population is made up of Israeli businessmen and other Jewish businessmen — mainly from the Commonwealth — seeking to profit from the Southeast Asian "economic miracle." This has resulted in a rapid increase in the Jewish population of Hong Kong, now estimated at 2,000-3,000.

"Hong Kong is the gateway to China and Southeast Asia," said Raz, an elegant Israeli with a 30-year career in the diplomatic service. "Hong Kong is used as a trading centre — exports from Israel are shipped to Hong Kong, and from here, they are shipped elsewhere. Hong Kong's expertise lies in its expertise to ship around the world."

Zim, the Israeli shipping company, has done business in Hong Kong for years, with mainly Chinese staff.

"Relations with China are proceeding very fully," Raz said, also forecasting that Hong Kong will be the gateway from Australia to Israel, using the territory as a centre point.

Israel exported $676 million (US) to Hong Kong in 1994, a significant increase of $80 million over 1993. Hong Kong, utlizing over 100 years of practice as an exporting nation, sent the goods to all parts of the globe through its harbor facilities, one of the best in the world, and Kai Tak airport, its single runway one of the busiest in the world.

With the crumbling of the Arab boycott, countries previously hostile to Israel, like Vietnam and Thailand, are quietly exploring business opportunities there. Much of the economic boom in Southeast Asia requires the rapid development of a previously non-existent infrastructure. Israel, with its advanced communications technology, can provide the expertise so badly needed.

Communist China is scheduled to take over Hong Kong in 1997.

When asked about what will happen after 1997, Raz, ever the diplomat, smiles and replies: "After 1997, there will be 1998."

Israel's future 'rosy and optimistic'

By CARL ALPERT
Special to The CJN

HAIFA — In the face of some of the depressing and critical news reports from Israel these days, let's look at some good news for a change. We don't have far to look. Bank Hapoalim, Israel's largest bank, has just published a rosy and optimistic picture of the Israel economy which gladdens the heart and lifts the spirits.

If the facts presented are accurate, and if the situation continues for the next year and a half, the prospects of the Labor government in the next election may not be as bad as present political polls predict. For people tend to vote not on the basis of major political issues, like the Golan Heights, or settlements in Judea and Samaria, nor even the fate of Jerusalem, but on the basis of their own economic well-being, and their expectations of how their pockets will be affected in the future.

And so we smile optimistically as we study the report of the bank's economists. The two most important elements in the situation, they say, are the massive Russian immigration, and the peace process.

The immigration, while it brought about a temporary rise in unemployment, also put a downward pressure on wages. As a result, labor costs in the private sector went down, enabling firms to expand employment, and bringing unemployment down from close to 12 per cent to under eight per cent.

The benefits from the peace process, "even if the road to a comprehensive peace in the region may be a bumpy one," will be in three areas: drastic savings from reduction of the need to remain on a constant war footing; opening up of new trade relations with our neighbors; expansion of trade with other countries of the world. The reduction in the defence budget, which today constitutes a drain on the economy, will make available large sums for education, health and welfare, and will also enable reduction in taxes.

We are already growing at a rapid rate, even in comparison with the great powers. Thus, gross domestic product for the years 1990-93 increased by 1.5 per cent in the United States, 1.8 per cent West Germany, 3.3 per cent in Japan — and 5.4 per cent in Israel. Our unemployment situation was better than in countries like Canada, France, Italy, Spain, Greece, Ireland. On the international scene we are in the category of the booming states of the far East, like South Korea, Singapore and Taiwan.

An encouraging picture indeed — except that not everyone is in agreement with the bank's economists. Hard-headed businessmen, noting the identification of Bank Hapoalim economists with the program and policies of the present Labor-led government, take a different view of the situation.

They warn that unemployment has turned up again, production is lagging, the adverse balance of trade is widening, interest rates are too high — and the government has no solutions. Dan Propper, head of the Israel Manufacturers' Association, warns that the public is living in a fool's paradise, and that we are only moments away from economic catastrophe.

In a picturesque figure of speech, spokespeople for the private sector declare that the responsible government officials are busy neatly arranging the lounge chairs on the deck of a ship which is apt to sink at any moment.

They cite dismal reports of heavy losses being sustained by many industrial and commercial firms, following a previous year of good profits. However, a careful examination of the financial statements reveals that a large part of the losses were sustained not from the commercial or production operations of the companies, but from their use of liquidity to speculate in the booming stock market, hoping for larger profits than could be achieved from their normal operations. Then came the crash, and the heavy losses from the speculation, despite the fact that in many cases their production went up and sales increased.

For every favorable report, there is an offsetting one. Thus, while it is true that exports increased last year by about 12 per cent, imports went up by 19 per cent.

As we head into the 1996 election year we may expect a surge of government benefits designed to make the voter feel personally comfortable. Watch the news.

Saltwater used to irrigate vines?

World Zionist Press Service

Golan, Gamla and Yarden are Israeli synonyms for good wine. In March, an unusual experiment was launched by the Jewish Agency — a vineyard in the Negev desert irrigated with salt water! Should it succeed, another name may be added to the fine wine list.

The 30 dunams of vines were planted near Kibbutz Sde Boker on the Beersheva-Eilat highway, as part of the Jewish Agency's Negev-Arava rural and development activities. The success of this experimental vineyard may lead to the planting of another 500 dunams in nearby Ramat Ovdah, at a cost of $1.8 million (US). It will create new jobs in the area and could also prompt the construction of a new "wine route" in the desert, which would be integrated into hi-tech agriculture, tourism and industry.

Yet the most intriguing part of this project is that the vines will be irrigated by salty water, pumped locally from the Qinoman Aquifer.

"The last grape-growers in this region were the Nabateans [300 BCE to 100 CE]," says Yigal Yerushalmi, director of the Negev Region of the rural and urban development department of the Jewish Agency. "And no-one has ever irrigated grapes with salty water. This will represent a major breakthrough in agriculture, and particularly in viticulture."

The salt water irrigation system, he claims, not only overcomes the natural problem of the availability of sweet water in the arid Negev desert, but also has other advantages. According to experimental research, the salt water will actually enhance the level of natural sugars in the fruit, and since it is pumped directly from a depth of 1,000 metres, the salinization of adjacent sweet water reservoirs — where traces of salt water were recently detected — will be prevented.

Arava, born on Kibbutz Sde Boker, named after the eastern part of the Negev desert, symbolically plants the first vine in Israel's first experimental salt-watered vineyard. [WZPS Photo]

Still dubious? According to Seruya, several quality wineries have already expressed an interest in the first yields, before planting has even begun. While the plan on paper seems far from dry, medium dry, or even sweet, the wine in the glass will be the litmus test for connoisseurs.

Frenkel elected chair of IDB

Jerusalem Dateline

JERUSALEM — The 36th annual meeting of the Inter-American Development Bank (IDB) in April was attended by some 2,500 delegates, including several dozen finance ministers and heads of government central banks.

At the start of three days of deliberations in Jerusalem's International Congress Centre, Bank of Israel governor Jacob Frenkel was elected chairman of the board of governors of the IDB. Frenkel, a former director of research for the international Monetary Fund (IMF), credited the honor with Israel's recent economic performance and growth of over six per cent per annum.

"The fact that a bank governor of a relatively small country like Israel," Frenkel observed, "is elected chairman of the IDB, reflects positively on Israel's economy."

The Washington-headquartered IDB is the world's largest regional development bank with 46 members, including the Latin American and Caribbean countries that it is designed to help, as well as Canada, the United States and 18 non-American members comprising 16 European states, Japan and Israel.

Newly elected chairman of the board of governors of the Inter-American Development Bank, Bank of Israel governor Jacob Frenkel addresses the annual meeting held this year in Jerusalem. [Photo: Israel Sun]

In the past six years some 15 Israeli firms have won $62 million (US) in IDB tenders. These companies include, for example, Tel Aviv-based Tahal Consulting Engineers, experts in water management, which has designed water supply systems in Guatemala, constructed pumping stations in El Salvador and is currently providing the engineering know-how for a hydro-electric power station in Venezuela.

Among the 30 trust funds administered by the IDB which facilitate infrastructure and industrial and scientific development in the region are the Israeli Consultant Trust Fund and the Israeli Technical Cooperation Fund.

Israel's trade with Latin America, which has risen dramatically in recent years, captured the attention of the delegates. Israeli exports to Latin America rose from $319 million in 1992 to $398 million in 1993 and $516 million last year. Imports from Latin America reached $270 million last year, compared to $225 million the previous year.

During the opening session Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin stressed the importance of economic development in fostering political stability and emphasized that the Middle East peace process will only gain momentum if Palestinian economic horizons are broadened.

Free Processing Zone gives Israel advantage

When the Knesset voted to pass the Israeli Free Processing Zones Law in June 1994, it made what many feel is a significant and far-reaching decision about the future of doing business in Israel.

The creation of a Free Processing Zone (FPZ) gives Israel an economic advantage: it provides the potential to attract up to $1 billion in direct foreign investment by offering tax incentives along with economic freedom to those companies who choose to locate within the zone.

The FPZ is essentially a business park, marked by secured boundaries, which operates by its own rules and regulations as stipulated by the Knesset-approved zones law. Companies operating within the zone are essentially "free" from the bureaucracy traditionally associated with establishing a business in Israel and "free" to conduct business in a free-market environment.

The FPZ gives export-oriented businesses an opportunity to thrive in an atmosphere dedicated to profits and growth through free enterprise. The incentive offered through the FPZ, when linked with Israel's Western-style infrastructure, sophisticated work force and strategic market access, accommodates the potential for growth and development without the constraints of political and bureaucratic interference.

The passage of the Free Processing Zones Law gives Israel the capability to attract investment, boost employment and increase exports — the tools it needs for unprecedented growth and economic independence.

Job Search is a monthly column on job-searching techniques by job search consultant Lisa Galet. Readers can forward any questions to The CJN.

Many unemployed people in their 40s and up have come to me expressing fear of ever finding a job again. In many cases their fears are real. New graduates can have more education, more current knowledge and fewer grey hairs.

Rather than a stumbling block, these details can make the older worker a valuable employee in other ways. If you are an older worker this article is for you.

Someone with over 15 years of work experience has knowledge of employer-employee politics. You know how to keep doing the same job over a long period of time. You know about loyalty. You know the importance of being current with whatever material you are required to work with. You know how to dress appropriately and how to treat people. You also have a pretty good understanding of who you are and what you are capable of.

The older worker especially needs to make sure he is respecting himself as much as he wants others to.

If carrying a business card is important, make one. List name, phone number and a line or two about what you are expert at doing. Hand out this card wherever you go. Attend professional association meetings and meet people. Present yourself as a specialist. Highlight a few of your abilities. Arrange for follow-up calls.

Only apply for jobs you are interested in doing and that will not lessen your self-respect. There is a job for everyone, it just might be difficult for you to locate the right one for you.

Consider becoming a professional consultant. Nowadays more and more people are becoming self-employed. Many companies prefer to hire an individual to accomplish a specific set of tasks over hiring on permanent staff.

Before you offer yourself for hire, however, research the market. Call competitors of your former employer and find out if they ever look for the type of expertise you provide. Ask them if they would consider talking to you. Then develop a business plan and market yourself.

If you require upgrading, take courses or attend seminars. Read publications that an expert in your field would read. Learn the new lingo for your field. Update your storehouse of experience. Ask someone you trust to take a look at how you dress, how you wear your hair. Even presidents and prime ministers update themselves from time to time.

As a final note, don't age yourself. It is not necessary to state on your resume that you graduated from Oxford in 1963. Just mention your degree and where you got it. Work experience before 1975 does not need to be on a resume. If you are returning to the work force after raising a family, highlight your strengths and abilities and list your voluntary activities. Once you've impressed someone with your skills and personality, they are less likely to worry about how old you are.

No Deal Unless Israel Has R&D Role

JERUSALEM — A ministerial committee linked Israel's final signature on a new free trade agreement with the European Union to Europe's willingness to have Israel play a non-voting role in the EU's multibillion dollar research and development budgeting panel.

The ministerial panel also called upon the EU to take steps to help redress the country's $7.4-billion (US) trade deficit with Europe. In a report released yesterday, the International Monetary Fund warned against the negative effect of Israel's ballooning trade deficit problem.

In absence of full agreement, the ministerial panel voted unanimously to merely initial the accord in principle.

Sharansky launches new political movement

Will shift focus to immigration

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service and Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — Natan Sharansky, the former Soviet Jewish activist and Prisoner of Zion, has announced the establishment of a new political movement he will lead.

"Yisrael ba-Aliyah" is expected to become a political party later in the year, making it eligible to compete in the 1996 elections. Observers agree it would be a magnet for new and recent arrivals.

The movement's name has two meanings in Hebrew — "Israel for immigration" and "Israel moving upward."

Speaking Wednesday in Hebrew and Russian before a crowd of more than 200 olim activists, Sharansky said the main aim of the movement is to change national priorities on immigration and absorption of Diaspora Jews.

The movement "strives to transform Israel from being a place of refuge for Jews escaping persecution, to being an attractive country for the world's Jewish Diasporas, in view of the quality of life and personal security which it offers its citizens," Sharansky said at a news conference.

He said another priority is to "strengthen the ideas of 'kibbutz galuyot,' the ingathering of the Jews the world over to Israel, and make it the central theme of our national agenda."

The movement, he explained, would focus on Israel's social problems, all of which are related directly or indirectly to aliyah and olim.

Natan Sharansky

The immediate goal, he said, is two-fold: to bring another million Jews from the former Soviet Union to Israel, and to better absorb and use the "potential" of recent immigrants.

He said only 10 per cent of immigrants' potential is being tapped.

"Our main goal is integration, not separation. Only the integration of the immigrant community can help solve the absorption problems, accelerate Israel's development."

The movement's leaders estimate it could win up to six Knesset seats in the 1996 elections.

"At the moment, it's a public political movement which will use all the political means at its disposal to gain its objectives," said former prisoner of conscience Yuli Edelstein, one of the group's founders. "If we don't succeed, we will consider turning into a party that will run for the Knesset."

Sharansky said he wants Israel "to attract new immigrants, rather than wait until a pogrom occurs, and they come anyway."

This is Sharansky's second attempt at establishing a political party for olim. He backed away from the idea just before the 1992 general elections.

The Russian olim party DA, which ran without him, failed to win representation in the Knesset.

More than 400,000 olim who emigrated from the former Soviet Union over the past few years will be eligible to vote in 1996. In addition, many of the more than 200,000 olim who came to Israel in the 1970s have become disenchanted with the major political parties.

Experts estimate that a new party catering to emigres could win as many as 10 Knesset seats and become a deciding force in Israeli politics.

Labor MKs join Third Way in call for early elections

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Three Labor members of the Knesset Sunday called on the government to resign and call elections.

MKs Avigdor Kahalani, Emanuel Zissman, and Ya'acov Sheffi voted along with executive members of the Third Way, demanding new elections "before this government creates any irreversible facts on the Golan and in Jerusalem."

The Third Way was founded last year by MKs opposed to the Labor government's handling of the peace process.

Labor Secretary-General Nissim Zvilli summoned the three renegade MKs to a meeting this past Monday.

The Third Way executive also asked to meet with Shas leader Rabbi Ovadia Yosef in a bid to enlist Shas' five MKs to vote for bills on the Golan Heights.

The bills call for a special Knesset majority of 70 MKs and 50 per cent of eligible voters in a referendum to approve any territorial compromise.

The resolution is seen as bringing the Third Way nearer to becoming a full-fledged political party in time for the 1996 elections.

Last Sunday marked the first time the Third Way called for the government's resignation.

Child immigrant poverty drops

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The number of immigrant children living below the poverty line in Israel has decreased dramatically, from 43 per cent in 1993 to 23 per cent in 1994, Absorption Minister Yair Tsaban announced last week.

Tsaban also pointed out that immigrant children have improved their academic performance, surpassing the national average success rate in college matriculation exams.

The findings were contained in first Immigrant Children in Israel report, published jointly by the ministry and the National Council for the Child in Israel.

The report found that children constituted 27 per cent of all immigrants who came between 1990 and the end of 1994.

Today, about 95,000 immigrant families with children live in Israel. The majority — some 57 per cent — have one child, and 11 per cent have three or more children.

Finnish legislators oppose shchitah

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

HELSINKI — Several Finnish legislators have voiced strong opposition to permitting the Jews of Finland to slaughter meat according to the laws of kashrut.

In a debate late last month, numerous members of Finland's parliament insisted that animals be stunned before the shchitah cut is made, a procedure that violates Jewish law.

After a lengthy parliamentary session dominated by those opposed to kosher slaughter, the issue was relegated to a committee. It is expected to come before the Finnish parliament again in August or September.

"To judge from the discussion, you'd think the Jews were barbarians and that it was a question of some kind of religious offering for the gods," said Dan Kantor, executive secretary of Helsinki's 1,100-strong Jewish community.

"They keep referring to it as 'ritual slaughter,' and that's something that hasn't happened in the Jewish religion for 2,000 years. We've told them many times that the term ritual slaughter gives a special meaning to the debate, but still they use it. That's a sign that something else is involved," Kantor added.

In a country with only two synagogues and an estimated 1,500 Jews out of a total population of about 5 million people, predominantly Lutheran, it is perhaps not surprising that the Jews of Finland feel misunderstood.

Kantor proudly shows visitors a display case containing a wreath that Finnish president C.G. Mannerheim gave the Jewish community in 1944 to honor Jewish soldiers who fought and died in the Finnish army, and he explains that Finnish wartime authorities resisted Nazi pressure to take action against the country's Jews.

However, when it comes to the issue of kosher slaughter, Kantor seems less willing to paint the Finns in a rosy light.

"You shouldn't use the word anti-Semitism too easily, because the Islamic community is also involved in this discussion, but it has to do with xenophobia or some kind of racism," he said.

Until now, Finnish Jews have imported their meat from North America: a recent shipment came from Levitt's Kosher Foods of Montreal.

Because Finland joined the European Union earlier this year, the community's next shipment of meat will probably come from somewhere in Europe.

The community does not have a shoichet and may not even get one in the unlikely event that the parliamentary vote is favorable, according to Kantor.

"It's not a question of the slaughter itself but a question of our religious rights and the fight against prejudice," he said. "It's going to be a very hard fight."

Kohl pledges stronger ties

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service and Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Following an historic and emotion-laced visit to Israel last week by German Chancellor Helmut Kohl, Israel and Germany pledged to strengthen bilateral relations.

Immediately after a welcoming ceremony last Tuesday at the Wohl Rose Garden in Jerusalem, Kohl visited the Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial.

"It is bad not to remember the past, but it is seven times worse if a lesson is not learned so that a better future can be built," he said.

Kohl later met with Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin. Both leaders promised to strengthen economic ties.

One highlight of the meeting was the signing of a multimillion dollar deal between the Volkswagen car manufacturer and Israel's Dead Sea Works.

The Israeli plant is to provide Volkswagen with magnesium for a lightweight, fuel-efficient car.

The two leaders also discussed Iran. Kohl spoke out against the proliferation of nuclear weapons, but did not answer questions about German ties with Tehran. Rabin also refused to comment on the matter.

Rabin and Kohl met with Jordan's King Hussein at the juncture of the Jordan and Yarmuk rivers, where the three leaders pledged their commitment to work together to develop regional water resources.

They reviewed plans for two dams and a desalination plant that would provide Jordan with an additional 215 million cubic metres of water every year.

The dam project, expected to cost $535 million, is being funded by the European Union. Germany has said it would pay at least 28 per cent and might increase its share of the financing.

Touvier sentence upheld

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — Paul Touvier, the first and only Frenchman convicted for crimes against humanity, has lost his last appeal.

France's supreme court, the Cour de Cassation, upheld the life sentence imposed on Touvier on April 20, 1994.

Touvier, who was the head of the collaborationist French militia in Lyon during World War II, was involved in the execution of seven Jewish hostages in Rillieux-la-Pape on June 29, 1944.

He can ask for a pardon from French President Jacques Chirac but his chances are not good, according to observers here.

June 5:

• Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, King Hussein and German Chancellor Helmut Kohl met on a hilltop in the Jordan Valley area of Naharayim 8 kilometres south of the Sea of Galilee -- an area recently returned to Jordan but leased back to Israel -- to announce a joint development project in which water will be supplied to Jordan from the Yarmuk River and the Sea of Galilee.

• The Israel Defence Force (IDF) announced that its forces in Hebron had killed Hamad Yamor, a member of the Az Adin al-Kassem terror cell, who had been wanted in connection with the murder of six Israelis.

June 6:

• Ha'aretz reported that a 23-year-old student at Yeshivat Ateret Cohanim in Jerusalem had been stabbed in the shoulder as he was walking near the Shchem Gate of the Old City. The student was treated in hospital and released; the assailant was not apprehended.

June 7:

• Finance Minister Avraham Shohat announced that the municipalities of Holon, Bat Yam and Rishon LeZion have agreed to each bear 10 per cent of the cost of the improvement and extension of the Ayalon highway, the main north-south arterial road through the heart of the populous Tel Aviv area.

• The IDF conducted five air raids against Hezbollah strongholds in south Lebanon. The raids were in response to recent Hezbollah attacks.

June 8:

• A soldier of the South Lebanese Army was killed by a bomb planted by Hezbollah.

June 9:

• U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher met with Rabin and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak in Cairo. The meeting was arranged by Christopher in the hope that a demonstrably good relationship between Egypt and Israel would assist peace talks between Syria and Israel. Mubarak said the meeting was "very positive. Our negotiations were in a very good atmosphere and I'm sure and I hope that we will continue on the same line till peace prevails all over."

• In response to reporters' questioning at the summit meeting in Cairo, the prime minister stated that a self-rule agreement between Israel and the Palestinians by the target date of July 1 may be difficult to reach.

Director, Jewish Museum of Western Canada

The Jewish Community of Winnipeg seeks the services of someone experienced in museum operations and interested in the challenge of establishing the new Jewish Museum of Western Canada. The Community is currently in the process of building an exciting new facility that will integrate schools, the Jewish Community Centre, and the new Museum on a single site in the fall of 1997. A director is required to work with the design committee and consultants in developing the museum, assembling the permanent collection and acquiring funding for acquisitions, planning related educational and cultural programming, and developing sources of revenue including membership structures, admissions, tours, and grants. The museum will include a temporary gallery and will house a Holocaust Resource Centre, as well as providing service to the general community. The successful candidate will develop marketing strategy, create a docent recruitment and training program, and prepare a business plan including staff, expenses, and revenue projections.

If you have experience and related education in Museum management, and a strong background in Judaica, and are interested in the challenge of creating the new Jewish Museum of Western Canada, send your resumé and salary expectations to: Faye Rosenberg-Cohen, Director of Planning, Winnipeg Jewish Community Council, 200 - 370 Hargrave Street, Winnipeg, MB, R3B 2K1.

Children become pawns in get battle

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

A handful of men fighting with their wives over the get [religious divorce], have added a new weapon to their arsenal.

They are contracting marriages for their underage daughters, making it necessary for them to receive a get when they wish to marry genuinely.

In order to extort money, custody privileges or other benefits from their wives, these husbands refuse to give the name of the bridegroom — thus making their daughters into agunot, unable to marry.

While there is no suggestion that the problem is widespread, there are reports of about 20 cases in New York and Montreal. One child is only six.

The Vaad Harabonim of Greater Toronto "denounced" this practice. It "censures those few individuals and rabbis who are engaged in such abhorrent and immoral behavior. The Torah's ways are paths of pleasantness and peace and we condemn those who cause a chillul HaShem, a desecration of G-d's name, through the misuse and abuse of its precepts."

The statement goes on to note that this practice, (called kidushei ketana), is permissible according to biblical law, so long as it is "for reasons other than (italics ours) extortion, the harrassment of estranged wives and the infliction of mental anguish upon minors."

Nevertheless, the Talmud in Kiddushin 41a, states "it is forbidden for a father to betroth his daughter while she is a minor, until she matures and says 'I want to marry so-and-so.' " This, the Vaad says, is the halachically normative position as codified by Maimonides and in the Shulchan Aruch.

U.S. Orthodox rabbis, including Rabbi Gedalia Schwartz, head of the Beth Din of America, affiliated with the Rabbinical Council of America, Rabbi David Bleich, dean and professor of law at Yeshiva University, and COLPA, the National Jewish Commission on Law and Public Affairs, are searching for legal and halachic remedies to this situation.

Among options being looked at are finding ways to invalidate the father's actions, or the acceptability of the witnesses; instituting communal sanctions against all those involved (including the witnesses and the rabbis who drew up the marriage agreement); and action by the New York legislature.

People interviewed by The Jewish Week, in their June 2 issue, say that they are afraid that this tactic will spread, partly because of what they consider an inadequate response by the rabbinate, which is in any case fragmented politically, and partly because recent publicity, including in The New York Times, have reminded recalcitrant husbands that the kedushei ketana, once performed as a method of protecting young girls, is in fact still allowed under biblical law.

The Jewish Week says that one group behind it, calling itself Shalom Bayis, has put up posters around Flatbush, which has a large Orthodox community. Besides urging men to stamp out what they call the "mini-Holocaust" of Jewish divorce by witholding gittin for at least five years, the posters and a phone message from Shalom Bayis outline and promote the procedures for kedushei ketana.

An unnamed spokesman for the group is quoted in the June 15 issue of The Jerusalem Report as saying "proudly" that in two recent cases, wives were terrified out of asking for a divorce because their husbands threatened to betroth their daughters.

Executive Director of Programming & Marketing
Jewish Community Centre, Winnipeg, Canada
The Jewish Community Centre of Winnipeg seeks the services of someone experienced in JCC program development, marketing, and management to take on the challenge of developing a new family oriented Jewish Community Centre. The community is currently in the process of building an exciting new facility that will integrate schools, the Centre, and a new Museum on a single site in the fall of 1997. The JCC expects a shift in program focus and membership from individuals to families and needs a dynamic individual to spearhead the introduction of recreational and cultural programming for the new Campus.
If you have education in programming, marketing, and management, and related Jewish community or JCC experience, and are interested in the challenge of creating a new Centre, send resumé and salary expectations to: Allan Fineblit, c/o Director of Planning, 200 - 370 Hargrave St., Winnipeg, MB, R3B 2K1.

Turkish Jewish leader injured by car bomb

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service and Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ANKARA — The head of the Turkish capital's small Jewish community was injured last Wednesday when a bomb exploded under his car.

Yehuda Yarum was on his way to Hacettepe University, where he heads the chemistry department, when the car bomb threw him through the windshield.

The explosion left a deep hole in the street and blew out windows in the area. Yarum was reported in stable condition in hospital.

A previously unheard of Islamic fundamentalist group, the Turkey Idealist Sharia Commandos' Army, claimed responsibility for the bombing, according to a Turkish news agency. As of last week, no arrests had been made.

Yarum's wife told Israel TV her husband received threatening pamphlets about a year ago, believed to have been sent by an Islamic fundamentalist movement.

The pamphlets read: "Dirty Jews, we don't want you to live here," Perla Yarum said.

There are just 200 Jews in Ankara. Most of Turkey's 23,000 Jews live in Istanbul.

Since 1986, when a terrorist bomb killed 21 congregants in the Neve Shalom synagogue in Istanbul, there have been a number of attacks on Jews and Israelis.

An Israeli official who contacted Ankara said people there were "terrorized" by the attack.

Turkish Jewish leaders, however, were quick to downplay the community's fears.

"We're quite upset about it, but such things happen all over the world. There is no sense of panic whatsoever," Hanri Yashova, vice-president of the Turkish Jewish community, said in a telephone interview.

The attack on Yarum comes after he requested, and received, increased police protection after the threats made by Islamic fundamentalists. He later withdrew the request.

The attack also comes in the wake of an appeal from a Turkish prosecutor, who has requested the death penalty for those convicted of a 1993 attempt to kill Jak Kamhi, a prominent Turkish Jewish businessman.

Orthodox oppose commercials on Shabbat and holy days

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — Israel's Orthodox community has launched a campaign against companies which run commercials on television and radio on Shabbat and other holy days.

Several major companies have already announced their compliance with the restrictions on commercials demanded by the ultra-Orthodox community, which constitutes some 20 per cent of Israeli society.

The boycott campaign was launched June 2 by the daily newspaper Yated Ne'eman in Bnei Brak.

The paper published a list of companies, most of them food and clothing manufacturers, whose commercials air on Saturday and other Jewish holy days.

Past consumer boycotts by the Orthodox community have proven effective.

One particular campaign against billboards that bore what were considered lascivious advertisements succeeded. Many leading companies changed their ads to comply with Orthodox standards.

The director-general of Yated Ne'eman, Ya'akov Lavin, said the goal of the latest campaign is to get Israel Television's Channel 2, as well as regional radio stations, to follow Israel Radio's example and not broadcast commercials on holy days.

London Hotel Fit For Royalty: Situated a short walk from Buckingham Palace in the posh neighborhood of Mayfair, London's deluxe Dorchester Hotel has had a long and distinguished association with the British royal family and many celebrity guests.

The pride of Park Lane since its opening in 1931, the Dorchester had been conceived as an advanced luxury hotel that would rank as the finest in Europe. One of its original decorators, Oliver Ford, had also been interior decorator for Queen Elizabeth and the Queen Mother.

The Dorchester's rooms supposedly reflect the refined style of a deluxe English country house. Many of its 197 rooms and 55 suites feature four-poster beds, fireplaces, fine wooden cabinetry and furniture, plush rugs and armchairs, embroidered bedspreads and draperies, and large walk-in closets designed for steamer trunks.

All the bathrooms are done entirely in fine white Italian marble. Actor Arnold Schwarzenegger has said that the Dorchester is the only hotel in Europe that possesses a bathtub large enough for him to relax in with his legs fully outstretched.

Also known for its generous dimensions, the mirrored ballroom has seen many celebrity functions. In the 1960s, the Toronto-based Lord Thomson of Fleet hosted an 85th birthday party for the Canadian-born Lord Beaverbrook, and filled the room with a forest of fir trees and an honour guard of Mounties.

With a staff-to-guest ratio of about three to one, the hotel's reputation for superb service and five-star cuisine has attracted many famous entertainers such as Barbra Streisand, the Beatles, Michael Jackson and Elizabeth Taylor. The list includes everyone from Mohammed Ali to Shelley Winters, Gloria Swanson to Cher.

All that's needed for a Dorchester experience is money. The cost for two people for an all-inclusive, two-night "romantic weekend" package, is about $1,276. The Dorchester Hotel, Park Lane, London W1A 2HJ. Telephone 071-629-8888. Fax 071-495-7351.

Israel Tourism Projections: Israel's steadily increasing tourist arrivals indicate that 4.3 million annual visitors — double the present number — will arrive by 2006, according to the Israel Ministry of Tourism. As a result, the ministry has commissioned eight teams of tourism development specialists to study the country's tourism infrastructure and to suggest improvements.

Priority areas of development are Jerusalem, Nazareth, Kfar Cana, Eilat, Tiberias and the Sea of Galilee region, Ashkelon, Ashdod, Caeserea, Rosh Hanikra and Israel's forests.

According to a ministry report, an initial investment of $11 million (US) is required to begin a program of upgrading of existing facilities and attractions. The program would eventually see the addition of some 50,000 hotel rooms in all classes nationwide.

Last month, Israeli tourism officials celebrated the opening of Teddy Hall, a new wing of the International Convention Centre (ICC) in Jerusalem. At 26,000 square feet, the $40-million (US), column-free hall is the largest in the Middle East. Named in honor of the former mayor of Jerusalem, Teddy Kollek, the octagon-shaped hall is built from Jerusalem stone.

"Teddy Hall kicks off a new generation of convention halls in Israel and the Middle East," says Ruth Ben-Tzur, director of the Israel Government Tourist Office in Toronto. "With the capacity to host up to 2,000 people, Teddy Hall puts ICC Jerusalem on the map as one of the world's foremost convention facilities."

PARTY CORRECTIONS

As the saying goes, it ain't a party until something's broke. In that spirit there are three things that need to be fixed from When? That A Party! the party planner published in the June 1 issue of The CJN. First, entertainer Shelley Miller (481-1034) should have been listed under Bands; second the correct phone number for Evelyn Baker Floral Design is 469-1089 and third Jacob's Catering Ltd. (886-3832/ 886-3810) was accidently left out of the Kosher Caterers listings.

What SINGLES are asking for ... JSR delivers

In a recent interview, Jewish Singles Registry of Toronto director Rob Singer spoke openly, on what has become one of the fastest, easiest, and least threatening ways for Jewish singles to meet.

Q: What makes The Registry so unique?

A: For one thing, our concept is simple, fast, and fun. The Registry takes a dynamic proactive approach to dating. Our unique selection process puts our members in control of who they would like to go out with, by reviewing comprehensive and detailed biography profiles of each of our members along with a photograph attached to each file. Our members have the options of choosing for themselves who they would like to go out with, accepting a date when they are chosen, or a combination of both.

Q: How much information is on the biography/profile?

A: The biographies are quite extensive. The format consists of a two page questionnaire with members being asked to include specific information about themselves as well as what they are looking for in a potential partner. Their hobbies, interests, and community involvement are just a few of the many questions asked. The photograph attached to each file enhances what has been read, giving the reader a very detailed overview of the person.

Q: With all that information, how do you respect confidentiality?

A: In a service like the Registry confidentiality takes first priority. Each file contains the members first name and a designated code number. No last name, address or phone number is ever shown, and a members first name and phone number are only disclosed when both parties have agreed.

Q: How large is your membership?

A: We are fast approaching the 800 member mark in Toronto alone, and have an additional 150 files from our Montreal and Ottawa offices. What makes this number so special is that we are only two and a half years old. Word of mouth advertising and a high "success rate" have generated a record number of new members joining our service.

Q: How do you define "success rate"?

A: In today's society it has become increasingly difficult for Jewish singles to meet one another. The J.S.R. has been designed and implemented to alleviate this problem and has done so with phenomenal results. Our system has become one of the fastest,and easiest ways for Jewish singles to meet. Members control how active they want their files to be. With new members joining on a daily basis there are always new files to review. We give out on average about 60 phone numbers a week, and have a countless number of weddings and engagements to our credit with three more to be announced shortly.

Q: Are there any guarantees when you join the J.S.R.?

A: Yes there are. If a member pays for a service they should get results, and that is what we guarantee. A member is guaranteed a minimum of six dates throughout the first year's membership; any less and the member stays in the service for free*. However most of our members average between 12-24 dates in a given year. Again it is the member that decides how active or inactive their file will be.

Q: How does the future look for the J.S.R.?

A: Very exciting... There are a lot of things happening behind the scenes that will only be made public within the next few months. Keep reading the Canadian Jewish News for more details. J.S.R. has worked hard to get to where we are today. With intermarriage still on the rise J.S.R. accepts the challenge of being Toronto's number one dating service and will continue to play a large role in the Jewish community.

Q: How does one contact the J.S.R.?

A: It's relatively simple. We are open six days a week, including evening hours. If for any reason you cannot reach us in person, just leave us a message and we will return your call at your convenience. Our phone number is 416-398-7068.

Please call for more details.

Tzedakah

Steeles Memorial Chapel

Steeles, a completely non-profit Community Chapel was created in 1927. Its mandate was and continues to be, to serve members of the Canadian Jewish Public in a sensitive and caring manner, at a time of great distress.

We at Steeles, are proud that quietly, we are able to reach out to the Community and help those persons and charities requiring funding and assistance. In this way, we memorialize the deceased by the Mitzvah of "Tzedakah".

The publication of recipients is to bring attention to their needs and to encourage other organizations to follow our lead. Moreover, we bring to the attention of the Public, both Jewish and non-Jewish, our desire to help in a time of need.

Our ad of May 25, 1995 in The Canadian Jewish News has resulted in many calls to us, asking for financial assistance. They will not be ignored.

We do not seek "reflected glory and direct gain." If we have a motive, it is to further serve our Community. No one in our organization, except our staff is paid. Our Board is composed of volunteers who go about their task with dedication and without personal gain.

Certainly it cannot be said that Steeles has as its incentive, any "commercial expediency". We are very proud of our charitable efforts and our desire is to let the community know that WE ARE THERE IF WE ARE NEEDED.

A COMMUNITY HALACHIC CHAPEL

Steeles Memorial Chapel: The good work continues

Steeles Memorial Chapel was founded in 1927, to provide the Jewish community with dignified funerals at reasonable cost. The earliest locations were first on Bathurst St., then on College St. when people moved north, so did College Memorial, changing its name to Steeles.

During the 68 years since its founding, Steeles Memorial has broadened its mandate to include ongoing support of many charities and institutions. Although financially self-supporting, Steeles Memorial Chapel does not keep its profits; once expenses are accounted for, every cent goes to charity. The Board of Trustees are volunteers and all are members of Jewish organizations.

Among the Jewish organizations to which Steeles donates are ORT, Reena, the Ronald Feld Fund for Syrian Jewry, the Jewish Russian Community Centre, the Jewish Public Library, Yad Vashem, Chabad Lubavitch of Ontario, Israel Cancer Research Fund, and many schools, yeshivot, camps and synagogues.

Besides organizations, Steeles offers help to needy families and individuals on an informal basis.

Steeles Memorial Charitable Fund has inaugurated a new outreachprogram. It discreetly contacts rabbis of all denominations, and quietly asks them who is in need. As John H. Pollock, Q.C., Legal Counsel states "we will help wherever we can. No one in the community should go without necessities."

The Board is also exploring interest in an airport chapel. Recently, Steeles Memorial Chapel's Chief Executive Officer, Kenny Bodenstein has personally undertaken and is overseeing the construction of a chapel at Branson Hospital.

Steeles Memorial sees itself as part of Canadian society at large, donating to non-Jewish charities such as the Salvation Army, the Canadian National Institute for the Blind, the AIDS Committee of Toronto, the Canadian Cancer Society, the Canadian Diabetes Society, and a number of other medical research foundations. Moreover, Steeles donates to The Toronto Hospital, the Hospital for Sick Children and many other Toronto area hospitals.

It is Steeles' policy that if a Jewish child under 18 dies, the funeral is without charge. "At such a time" says Treasurer, Henry Lederman, "there is more than enough grief and trauma for the family to deal with." No other North American Jewish funeral chapel has this policy.

Steeles is sensitive to the needs of the living. One new project is a bereavement committee to counsel people through grief and mourning, to make it easier for them to reclaim their lives. Also, if there is a need, Steeles will send someone to a shiva house to lead prayers.

In sum, Steeles Memorial is involved in every aspect of Jewish life, and has an innovative approach to Tzedekah. While resources are not bottomless, no worthy cause goes unconsidered; new ideas are constantly being looked at. "Where we're needed, and to the extent we can, we'll help" says President, Mike Rogow.

Every funeral at Steeles Memorial is also helping a large number and variety of worthy causes. The deceased are memorialized by the giving of Tzedakah. The direct recipients are those organizations which improve the quality of life for the poor, the sick, children and the aged. This must be why, as Bodenstein states, "Steeles has gained greater acceptance over the past decade."

Steeles Memorial believes in offering options and flexibility to the bereaved, and paying attention to their wishes. Often, cost is tailored to ability to pay. Full service is available, in which Steeles handles every detail that must be dealt with; alternatively, more modest, more affordable arrangements are available. Steeles recognizes, as well, that some people cannot afford to pay at all.

Whatever the choice, one thing is not flexible: all funerals are in strict accord with halachah.

The president of Steeles Memorial is Mike Rogow; the Chief Executive Officer is Kenny Bodenstein; 1st V.P. Nat Green; 2nd V.P. Marvin Lister; Treasurer, Henry Lederman; Secretary, Morris Grafstein; Executive Members are Wilf Kideckel and Ernie Marmurek; Legal Counsel is John H. Pollock, Q.C. Steeles Memorial Chapel is at 350 Steeles Ave. West, in Thornhill. For information please call (905) 881-6003 or (416) 733-2000.

The cuisine of the future: To taste it is to love it.

Seafood Warehouse International Corp. paves the way into the next century!

Increasing knowledge of how to link good diet with overall good health is motivating people to become better informed about the nutrition content of their food – and to change their eating habits. Gradually, more and more people are abandoning high-cholesterol, high-calorie, high-fat foodstuffs, in favor of good-tasting vegetable- or fish-based meat substitutes with maximum nutrition value.

Increasingly, the food industry is responding to this trend, supplying new varieties of vegetarian or seafood cuisine – and combining quality with taste. Gone are the days when anyone could call vegetarian foods "bland". Great progress has been made, both in developing tasty meat substitutes and making food processing more healthful; and the variety and quality of seafood products on the market has increased as well.

Seafood Warehouse is in the forefront of this trend, supplying its customers with what chief executive officer Henry Ender calls "the cuisine of the future".

Among the special products offered by Seafood Warehouse are the Golden Harbour line of smoked salmon. These award winning British Columbia products, available in Canada, the United States, Europe and Asia, are rapidly becoming known for quality and uniqueness.

Golden Harbour products are 100 per cent natural, cured in natural salts and smoked by a special process with a blend of sawdusts from British Columbia forests. Using both old and new methods, they are cured to the highest standards of quality control, then carefully vacuum-sealed, frozen and boxed to preserve this quality.

A versatile product, Golden Harbour smoked salmon is always ready to serve – as hors d'oeuvres, on bagels with cream cheese, or however your palate desires. It can also be served as an entree, or in omelettes, quiches or casseroles.

There are many varieties of Golden Harbor smoked salmon: red sockeye, with bright red flesh, strong flavor and firm texture; red Pacific coho, with red flesh, mild flavor and firm texture; Atlantic, with orange flesh, mild flavor and soft texture; Gravlox, marinated salmon in slices with dill; pink, with pink flesh, mild flavor and soft texture, Norwegian or Scottish style; specialty items like salmon pate, Indian candy, hot and cold smoked chunks; and retort packs of hot smoked salmon.

Golden Harbour also offers ground fish, including sole, cod, snapper, perch and turbot; fillets and fillet portions of sockeye, coho and pink salmon, and halibut; frozen sockeye, coho and pink salmon; sockeye, coho, chum, spring salmon, halibut, tuna, swordfish, shark and mahimahi steaks; salmon and halibut tail roasts; and imitation crab, or sirimi.

Seafood Warehouse is also the exclusive Canadian importer of the Sea Chef line of delicacies from Kibbutz Eilon, Israel. These include fish cutlets with selected vegetables, breaded fish fillets and schnitzels, and gourmet substitutes for crab, shrimp, calamari and scallops made from Atlantic pollock. These products are rich in protein and other nutrients, and low in fat and cholesterol; all are strictly kosher under the supervision of the Chief Rabbinate of Israel.

Seafood Warehouse is also a distributor of Zoglo's Vegetarian Choice products from Israel. These are all-natural, 100 per cent vegetable protein products, with no cholesterol, no additives, preservatives or artificial coloring, and very low saturated fat content. They combine the natural goodness of vegetarian proteins with the juicy richness of traditional meat dishes, offering a true taste treat.

Among the delicacies Zoglo's offers are tender vegetable burgers, golden "taste like chicken" nuggets, vegetarian wieners, vegetable patties and cutlets, and kebabs. These products can be eaten in the style of the meat dishes which they replace; the burgers, for example, can be barbecued. Zoglo's products are kosher parve.

The Seafood Warehouse prides itself on its small, well-structured management team, which allows it to make quick decisions while maintaining close contact with clients. The company's mission is to improve clients' profitability, while providing customers with the highest quality products at the lowest possible price.

CEO Henry Ender has experience in the seafood industry, extensive market knowledge, a flair for innovation, and a personalized approach in dealing with customers. Fred Farnden, President and Chairman of the Board, has administrative skill and extensive knowledge of the seafood industry. Together, they have led Seafood Warehouse to rapid growth during its 18 years, and made it a leader among those who bring their customers the "cuisine of the future".

The Seafood Warehouse, open seven days a week to supply stores, delis, caterers and the public, is at 161 Denison St., in Markham; phone (905) 470-1700 or fax (905) 470-8255.

New beginnings at Lawrence and Bathurst Crystal Towers soon to open

Menkes Developments Inc. has been active in the development industry for 40 years, since 1955. They began with houses, and have been building condos in the Greater Toronto area since 1969, when this form of ownership began to play a role in Toronto's real-estate market. Some people who once lived in Menkes houses now own condominiums built by Menkes.

The company's major areas of business today are residential condominium communities, and commercial and industrial office buildings; they put up a new condominium development every year. Menkes is an integrated service company which buys land, develops it, markets, sells and manages the development; it also does third-party management. In everything from workmanship to knowledge of the market, each area of business profits from experience gained in the others.

Characteristic of all their developments is a commitment to quality, value, innovation and integrity. "Crystal Towers, however, is something special," says Mark Cohen, vice-president of residential marketing. "This is Bathurst Street, and Bathurst Street is Menkes turf."

Crystal Towers, Menkes' new highrise condominium buildings, will be built at 2 Covington Road, at the northwest corner of Covington and Bathurst, just north of Lawrence Plaza. "The development will complement and enhance the neighborhood and its strong historical roots and community," says Cohen, "and represents in our minds what the neighborhood has waited for, for a long time."

Crystal Towers will contain 290 suites in total, with 135 in the first building. Each building will have its own lobby, although access to each from the outside will be through a central lobby. This layout will add a hotel-like ambience to the address, and at the same time make a strong statement about security.

The lobby will be manned 24 hours a day. State-of-the-art security features will ensure constant surveillance of underground and outside areas, common inside areas, and suite floors. Today's condominium owners don't just ask for top quality security features: they demand them.

Crystal Towers will satisfy these concerns. They are important not only when you are home, but also when you are away on vacation or business, and can feel secure and "care-free" in the knowledge that your home is protected.

Both the water and the apartment are gas-heated. Each apartment is metered individually, so that you pay only for what you use, and reap the benefits of household economy. This is an important advantage if you take long trips out of town, and turn your heat down for long periods of time.

It is expected that many buyers will be "empty nesters", 55 to 70 years of age, who are new to full-time condominium living. Many of this group will be coming from 40- to 50-year-old homes in the Bathurst-Lawrence area valued from $250,000 up. Menkes expects to offer two-bedroom condos in the $150,000-to-$250,000 range, allowing buyers to bank significant sums of money once their house is sold.

A cross-section of buyers is expected, however. Crystal Towers will be ideal for young marrieds with an infant, for example, or professional couples where both spouses are focusing on their careers.

Crystal Towers will offer its residents many social and recreational amenities. Facilities will include an outdoor swimming pool, indoor whirlpool, exercise room and party room. Common social areas will allow residents and their guests to meet and socialize within Crystal Towers. Also, there is a guest suite within the building.

Although standard finishes will be quite elaborate, buyers can upgrade their units. As in all Menkes communities, the exterior will be landscaped and manicured immaculately.

Crystal Towers will complement the positive changes the Bathurst-Lawrence neighborhood is already beginning to see. Lawrence Plaza is being renovated, and many of the businesses on Bathurst St. and Avenue Rd. are being upgraded; but many long-established businesses, restaurants, kosher stores, etc., have remained and will remain. Many residents love this area, and will not leave it.

This is a neighborhood with easy access to the 401 and both subway lines. It is pleasant area, with many well-cared-for older homes and plenty of shade trees. Menkes looks forward to making its own contribution to this area, which is enjoying an infusion of new life and energy, while keeping its continuity.

The Menkes name is known along Bathurst between Centre St. and Finch Ave., to about 4,500 people living in Menkes condominiums, who can vouch for the commitment to quality, innovation, integrity and value. This is a company that listens closely to buyers, from the acquisition of property through to management afterwards, and knows what the market wants.

A new sales office is being completed on location, with a model suite attached. Pre-construction sales are expected to start in early summer. If you want to come to see Crystal Towers, call the Presentation Centre for information at (416) 781-0222.

Reena Foundation: Another step forward

The Reena Foundation's Gala Dinner is one of the community's most successful, most anticipated social events. It allows Reena to illustrate the important work it does for people with developmental handicaps – show the expansion of this work – and thank the many supporters who make it possible.

Reena was founded in 1973 by parents of developmentally handicapped children, as an alternative to institutions. In those days, because these children were considered "mentally incompetent", there was nowhere else for them to go as adults. Reena has played a major role in improving the quality of their lives.

Reena has evolved into three related organizations. REENA provides support services to clients and families, including a day program which teaches life skills, offers training for the workplace, and finds jobs. BATAY REENA develops and operates non-profit housing without provincial assistance, with staffing tailored to the type of handicap and the number of people. REENA FOUNDATION raises private funds to maintain services.

Cutbacks by the Ontario government means more reliance on private sources; and the waiting list of several hundred people grows faster than needs can be met.

This year's Gala dinner takes place on Wednesday, June 21st, at the Regal Constellation Hotel, 900 Dixon Rd. in Etobicoke. All funds raised through this Dinner go towards the soon-to-be-built Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre on Clark Ave.

The first of its kind in North America, the 45,000-foot-square centre will show how people with special needs can be productive members of society. It will provide a warm, stimulating environment for hundreds of developmentally handicapped adults, offer the services they need to lead full, healthy lives in the community, and provide relief support for those who care for family members at home.

Tom Ungar is chairman of the 1995 Gala Dinner Committee, and Capital Campaign chairman for the Toby and Henry Battle Centre. Bert Raphael heads the Dinner fundraising committee. Ken Shaw, news anchor for CFTO Night Beat News will be master of ceremonies.

Always wanted to be photographed with Marilyn Monroe, watch Bette Midler and Tina Turner perform? Now's your chance! Be at the Regal Constellation on June 21, and enjoy this virtual reality experience. For your added enjoyment, there will be dancing to the Joe Star Band.

240 EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES

BAYCREST CENTRE FOUNDATION

The Baycrest Centre Foundation and the Centre's associated service groups raise funds to support the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care. They are seeking two key individuals to join their management team.

DIRECTOR, WOMEN'S AUXILIARY

The Women's Auxiliary is comprised of thousands of volunteers involved in the operation of a cafe, a gift shop, a Speaker's Bureau, sales, galas and other significant projects. The Director, working in close partnership with the President and other volunteer leaders of the Auxiliary, plans, directs and coordinates all Auxiliary activities, including managing staff and preparing and controlling budgets.

DIRECTOR, MEN'S SERVICE GROUP

The Men's Service Group operates a variety of high-profile projects including the Baycrest Challenge and Honour Roll, as well as Sunday Brunches, Thursday Night Clubs and other activities. The Director has planning, staff and financial management responsibilities, and works in close partnership with the President and members of the Men's Service Group to execute these important services and fundraising activities.

Both of these senior positions report to the Foundation Executive Director. Ideal candidates must have strong administrative and management skills. Superior interpersonal and communication skills are essential. You enjoy working with committed and very talented volunteers in an innovative environment which values energy, creativity and excellence.

Please reply in confidence by July 14 to 121 Bloor Street East, Suite 405, Toronto, Ontario. M4W 3M5

JERUSALEM 3000:
The Greatest Event of the Trimillenium!

Excitement is generating around Toronto as the evening of Sunday June 18th rapidly approaches. On this momentous night, the entire Toronto Jewish community is invited to experience the sights and sounds of Jerusalem, as "Aish HaTorah Celebrates Jerusalem 3000" takes centre stage at the Royal Alexandra Theatre. Ed Mirvish, Honourary Co-Chair of Aish's 1995 Annual Fundraising Event, has gone "Crazy for Aish", cancelling the June 18th performance of "Crazy for You" to host an equally spectacular production.

Jerusalem 3000 is an international extravaganza being held throughout 1995 and 1996, commemorating the trimillenium of King David's establishment of Jerusalem as the capital of the Jewish People. It will be celebrated in spectacular fashion by myriad events, organizations and individuals, all orchestrated by the State of Israel.

Working together with the National Committee for Jerusalem 3000 and the Jerusalem Mayor's Office, Aish HaTorah, whose World Center stands in the very heart of Jerusalem at the Western Wall, is proud to host this first gala Canadian celebration that will help to set the stage for a year of joyous international festivities.

Co-chaired by showman extraordinaire Mirvish and Leslie Dan, chairman of pharmaceutical giant Novopharm, the evening will be enhanced by distinguished performers and dignitaries who symbolize the splendour of Israel and the Jewish people in unique ways. Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert is flying in from Israel to be keynote speaker. Master of ceremonies is Malcolm Hoenlein, of the National Committee for Jerusalem 3000, and Vice-Chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations. Famed Israeli entertainer Yoel Sharabi, who has captivated audiences worldwide, will be giving a special performance commissioned exclusively for this historic celebration.

An Honourary Tribute Committee has been assembled that includes The Honourable Henry N.R. Jackman, Lieutenant Governor of Ontario; The Honourable Barbara McDougall; Mayors Mel Lastman and Lorna Jackson; The Honourable Arthur Eggleton; Norman Jewison; and Al Waxman.

Aish HaTorah's Jerusalem 3000 Event will provide the community with the opportunity to pay tribute to and express unity with, the people of Israel.

An elegant evening filled with song, dance, laughter and delight awaits you at the Royal Alex on Sunday June 18th. Please join us in commemorating this milestone in Jewish history. Some last minute tickets are still available. To reserve your spot, please call TicketKing at (416) 593-4225. ■

Jerusalem - The Ideal Capital

How The City of David Will Strengthen National Unity

Jerusalem, 2756 — The moment King David's soldiers set foot inside the citadel of Jerusalem and were able to look around the commanding site it occupied, it became clear that the conception to make this city the capital of the Kingdom of Israel was an inspired one.

What was not so sure was what the reaction of the people would be, particularly the tribesmen of Benjamin and Judah, whose territories border Israel's new metropolis on north and south, respectively. The land around the capital is rocky and difficult to work. It would take time, too, before a living could be made in the capital itself. Jerusalem is a place for craftsmen, traders, shopkeepers and merchants - not farmers and herdsmen, as most of the Benjaminites and Judaites are.

Fears Vanish

In the few weeks that have elapsed since the capture of Jerusalem, these fears have been laid to rest. From the very start the tribesmen were enthusiastic about living in Jerusalem, which they immediately began to call the City of David.

Moreover, the King lost no time in launching a vast building programme under his personal supervision. Historic changes are taking place under our very eyes. There seems no doubt that the capital of Jerusalem will endure for many generations. All signs point to the fact that Israel has come to this place to stay.

What Is The Jerusalem Times?

Welcome to "The Jerusalem Times", a publication of Aish HaTorah (see p.27 for information about Aish). This special issue is in tribute to Jerusalem 3000, and to the Celebration taking place this Sunday at the Royal Alexandra Theatre in downtown Toronto.

Inside you'll find a wide variety of "contemporary" articles - some contemporary to King David's time, others contemporary to our own! We've included a little history about how The City of David was established (see cover story and p. 4), a walking tour through Old Jerusalem (see p. 10), and excerpts from books on Jerusalem by architect Moshe Safdie (p. 16) and Rabbi Aryeh Kaplan (p. 12). International developer David Azrieli has included an article discussing Jerusalem as a thriving business centre (p. 7). There's fun (see the King David Quiz by Allan Gould on p. 19) and even food (see the review of Jerusalem's "first" restaurant on p. 20)!

We hope you enjoy reading this special keepsake, and gain some insight into this golden city, the magical capital of the Jewish People. ■

KING DAVID UNITES JERUSALEM

by Rabbi Avraham LeBowitz
Public Affairs Reporter

Jerusalem 2756 - Crowds rejoiced in the streets this morning as King David announced he and his soldiers had conquered the fortified Jebusite stronghold and united Jerusalem. King David commended Yo'av for being a great general in the battle. When the forces were advancing on the Citadel, King David challenged that whoever would smite the Jebusites first would become chief and captain. Yo'av accepted the challenge and went up first.

Today's events in Jerusalem are the crowning glory to King David's spectacular career, which began with his slaying of the giant Goliath.

The seventh son of Yeshai, who is descended from Judah, the son of Jacob, King David has seven wives and six sons. Despite

Historic Associations

Our ties with Jerusalem date back to our ancestor Abraham, in whose days the city bore the name of Salem. Significantly, the King of Salem, one of Malkizedek, was known as "high priest to the Supreme G-d." He was an ally of Abraham, to whom he lent both moral and material support when our early ancestor journeyed to this country, nearly 1,000 years ago.

When the tribes of Israel returned from Egypt some centuries later, they found Jerusalem in the hands of the Jebusites, a primitive, idol-worshipping people. But the conquest of this mountain stronghold was too formidable a task to be attempted by the Israel of Joshua's day.

During the early days of the monarchy in Israel, it became increasingly obvious, however, that Jerusalem could not remain the sole foreign city in Israel - situated, as it is, in the very heart of the state.

A Wise Choice

When King David was looking about for a suitable site for the capital of the unified tribes of Israel, it occurred to him that, while the city ought to be in neutral territory to avoid arousing tribal jealousies, he might as well take a city as near as possible to Benjamin, which, through his own election to the throne, had been deprived of the seat of the monarchy (after Israel's first regent, Saul, had come from its ranks). Jerusalem - lying on the boundary between Benjamin and David's native Judah - was the ideal, from this point of view.

King David's choice of Jerusalem was a wise one from a number of other standpoints as well:

(1) Jerusalem is a highly important road junction. The caravans to and from Egypt, and to and from Jericho and Transjordan, pass through the city. Following the conquest of Canaan by Joshua, there was a certain falling off in foreign trade. But with the stabilization of the Israelite regime, trade gradually came back to normal.

Now that a treaty has been signed with Hiram of Tyre, and David's military victories are daily opening new opportunities for intercourse with the surrounding peoples, there is no doubt that Jerusalem will become increasingly important as a commercial centre.

(2) Jerusalem is a first-rate defensive bastion. Built among mountain peaks, it is surrounded on all sides by valleys, of which those on the north are less pronounced than those on the other three sides. There is an abundance of stone and rock in the vicinity. These are of great value in the building of fortifications. The stone is of a lovely rose hue, and one can imagine the beautiful palaces that can be constructed of it when the country rests from war and we can enjoy the blessings of peace.

(3) Jerusalem is centrally located. When the country settles down, there will be a temptation for the various tribes to devote themselves to the cultivation of their fields and to forget that they are one people with their brethren in other parts of the country. This happened during those rare periods of quiet we enjoyed in the time of the Judges. It is hoped that now that the Tent of the Sanctuary as well as the Royal Palace are located in Jerusalem, this city will act as a force knitting the people together into one strong nation.

(4) Jerusalem is distinguished by an excellent mountain climate. The air is rare and clear, making it possible to see long distances (which has both aesthetic and military advantages).

These are the physical advantages of Jerusalem. But one lesson we ought to learn from the fate of the Jebusites who formerly inhabited the city: No capital is impregnable, and no matter how much we fortify the city, it will always be in danger unless we realize that, ultimately, it is G-d who determines the real security of strongholds.

BROTHERS MEET ON MOUNTAIN IN MIDDLE OF NIGHT

by Rabbi Avraham LeBowtiz
Nightlife Reporter

Mount Moriah — Two brothers who met last night on Mount Moriah, were today able to explain the unusual events concerning their wheat supplies that have occurred over the last few weeks.

The two brothers live on opposite sides of the mountain. One brother is unmarried and childless, while the other is married and has many children. Each brother has, for some time now, empathized with the plight of the other.

One dark night, the unmarried brother brought a bundle of wheat and added it to his brother's pile to help feed his family. That same night, the married brother, concerned that his brother did not have any children to care for him, brought a bundle of wheat and put it in his brother's silo.

The next morning, each brother had the same amount of wheat as before. That night, each brother again brought the other a bundle of wheat. This went on for many weeks, until last night the brothers met on top of the mountain. Realizing what had happened they embraced.

It is on this exact spot, that the Temple will be built. ■

King David Buys Site for Temple

by Elliott Katz
Real Estate Reporter

Jerusalem 2756 — "Location, location, location," were the reasons given today by King David as he completed the purchase of the threshing field of Araunah the Jebusite on Mount Moriah for the site of the future Temple.

Known for his ability to overcome Goliath challenges, King David said the field was the perfect site for the Temple. He provided some background:

➢ On Mount Moriah, on which the Temple Mount was built, is the Foundation Stone, the focus around which the world was created.

➢ Adam was created from the spot where the Altar of Temple later stood. Adam lived in the Garden of Eden until he sinned by eating the forbidden fruit and was ejected. He then returned to Mount Moriah where he built an altar and offered a sacrifice to try to atone for his sin.

➢ Cain and Abel, the sons of Adam and Eve made offerings on the altar that Adam built.

➢ Adam's altar on Mount Moriah was destroyed by the flood in the time of Noah. After the flood, Noah returned and rebuilt the altar.

➢ When Abraham was 100 years old he had a son Isaac. G-d tested Abraham by commanding him to sacrifice Isaac. Abraham rebuilt the altar on Mount Moriah.

➢ Jacob fell asleep on Mount Moriah and dreamed about a ladder standing on the ground with its top in the heavens. The rock he slept on was the Foundation Stone where later stood the Ark of Covenant in the Holy of Holies of the Temple.

"Now that we've closed the deal, I'm going to gather construction materials and start digging the foundation," King David added, noting that a July 2757 completion date was expected. ■

The Ark of the Covenant

Jerualem, 2770 — In a solemn ceremony, culminating in a magnificent popular festival, the Ark of the Covenant of G-d was brought into Jerusalem by King David yesterday from the home of ObedEdom, where it had found a temporary resting place.

King David himself conducted the chorus and orchestra in the performance of his latest composition - a song of overpowering beauty, dramatizing the grand entrance of the Ark's bearers into the square where the tabernacle had been set up. Just before the Holy Ark was placed inside the tabernacle in which it is to repose from now on, the King danced before the Ark, holding the huge crowd completely spellbound from start to finish.

After this joyful performance, King David offered up sacrifices, blessed all those assembled for the occasion, and then saw to it that everyone received the royal gift of meatbread and raisins lavishly soaked in wine.

Free Refreshments

The King then repaired to the royal palace of the official reception of the tribal delegates and of dignitaries of various foreign countries.

Meanwhile, the happy populace surged through the streets of the capital. Those who had come from other towns slowly made their way out of the city, and the Hills of Judah echoed their songs and their joyous laughter.

Excerpted from "Chronicles - News of the Past" ■

his busy schedule as husband, father, monarch and warrior, he even finds time to play the harp and write beautiful psalms. At the tender age of 30, he began his reign over the tribe of Judah. He is credited with uniting the Jewish people after years of divisiveness and war between troops loyal to Ishboshet and the tribe of Judah.

Later today, King David announced that the Holy Ark will be taken out of Kiryath Yearim and brought to Jerusalem. Tens of thousands of people are expected to escort the Ark with lyre and shofar, and singing and rejoicing. King David will lead the procession himself. ■

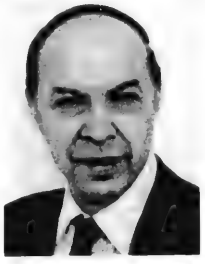
Aish HaTorah Celebrates
JERUSALEM 3000

Aish HaTorah Celebrates Jerusalem 3000!

Aish HaTorah Toronto is pleased to announce the following appointments for its Sunday, June 18th Gala Event.

Ed Mirvish

Ed Mirvish will assume responsibility as Honourary Co-Chairman of the Event. Affectionately known as "Honest Ed", Mr. Mirvish has become a Canadian legend in the entertainment world. He is President and Chief Executive Officer of Honest Ed's Ltd. (a 160,000 sq. ft. retail area) and the world famous Royal Alexandra Theatre. He is also the Director of Honest Ed's Ltd., Ed Mirvish Enterprises, and The Old Vic Theatre in London, England. In addition, Mr. Mirvish owns six restaurants adjacent to his Royal Alexandra Theatre, as well as "Mirvish Village", a showcase of boutiques and restaurants .



Leslie Dan

Joining Mr. Mirvish as Honourary Co-Chairman is Leslie Dan, Chairman of pharmaceutical giant Novopharm Ltd. Born in Budapest, Hungary, Mr. Dan came to Canada after the war.

In addition to being a successful businessman, Leslie Dan is a major philanthropist. In 1985 he founded the charity CAN MAP, which has distributed over $2.5 million worth of medicine to Third World countries. Involved in numerous Jewish organizations, The Dan family recently dedicated Aish HaTorah's new World Center at the Western Wall in Jerusalem, as well as Aish HaTorah Toronto's new permanent home, the Dan Family Aish HaTorah Community Centre in Thornhill.

Mayor Ehud Olmert

Appointed as keynote speaker for the evening, is Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert. Born in Israel in 1945, he was elected to the eighth Knesset in 1973 at the age of twenty-eight. Since then, he has been re-elected five consecutive times.

Between 1981 and 1988, Mr. Olmert served as a senior ranking member of the Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee in the Knesset. Since then, he has served as a minister in the Israeli Cabinet under Yitzhak Shamir, first as Minister of Minorities and later as Minister of Health. Additionally, Mayor Olmert was the senior and managing partner of the law firm, Ehud Olmert & Co.

Malcolm Hoenlein

Assuming duties as Master of Ceremonies for the Gala is Malcolm Hoenlein, Executive Vice-Chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, the coordinating body on national and international Jewish concerns for over 50 national Jewish organizations. The National Committee for Jerusalem 3000 is under the auspices of this organization.

Mr. Hoenlein has written and lectured extensively on international relations, Israel and Middle East Affairs, Soviet and World Jewry, the American Jewish community, political affairs, intergroup relations and domestic concerns. In 1993, he gave an inspiring address at Aish HaTorah's Report on the State of World Jewry, at the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation. ■

EXCITING BUSINESS OPPORTUNITIES IN ISRAEL

Opening ceremony of the Jerusalem Mall.
Mr. Azrieli, Ted Kollek, Uzi Wexler and standing behind Mr. Azrieli is Ariel Sharon.

by David J. Azrieli

Jerusalem, the spiritual centre of Israel and the Jewish People, and the seat of Government, is becoming a thriving centre for business as well.

In March of 1993, I opened the largest shopping centre in the Middle East in Jerusalem. The mall, which has some 400,000 square feet of net leasable area, has a parking structure for 2,000 cars, office space, a synagogue and other facilities. The centre has more than 180 shops, 2 department stores, a supermarket, a cinema, and a large food court. Major foreign-based retailers such as Benetton, Esprit, and Marks and Spencer are operating their businesses in the mall, as are Diaspora Jews who have brought their special skills and products. Canadians among these are the Koffler family's Superpharm drug stores, Aldo Shoes, and others. Sales per square foot are exceeding those in America's best malls.

After 2 years in operation, the centre is a great success. It attracts thousands of shoppers daily, and has become a focal point for Jerusalemites and an attraction for visitors. In fact, it serves a market far greater than the city itself; clearly, this business endeavour is a resounding success.

It is the overwhelming popularity of "Canion Yarushalayim" that provided the impetus to catapult south-west Jerusalem, an area with diverse demographics of Jews and Arabs, religious and secular, into Jerusalem's new downtown.

In addition to our mall, the area already has the Teddy Kolleck Stadium, the Israel Tennis Center, a major sports complex, the Jerusalem Biblical Zoo, and a School of Technology. Directly across the street from the mall is a 15-acre technology park which is dedicated to science-based and high technology industries. The 50 million dollar park is already home to industries in electronics, pharmaceuticals, biotechnology, optics, telecommunications, and computer software.

The synergy between this park and the many scientists and scholars from Jerusalem's world-renowned Hebrew University is obvious. Jerusalem, like Israel as a whole, has some of the best trained professionals in the world. Her greatest natural resource is her people, who are being augmented daily by the arrival of highly-skilled immigrants, especially from Russia. This windfall of talent has already attracted many investors and foreign businesses. Many more are actively investigating other opportunities, especially in light of Israel's unique position with the great markets of the world. As a result of Israel's proximity to the emerging Middle East and its trade agreements, providing free access to the European Economic Community and to the United States and Canada, Israel has positioned itself, once again, at the international crossroads for east-west and north-south trade.

Another significant benefit to doing business in Jerusalem, is the availability of financing from local banks. When I first started business in Israel in 1983, Israeli banks were not ready to finance new ventures. Today, the reality is totally different. Financial institutions are competitive and active in dealing with new ventures. My own enterprise is financed exclusively by Israeli banks.

In short, the prospects for business in Jerusalem are both exciting and encouraging. The ingredients for a successful venture are readily present - a thriving population, a highly skilled labour force, a pro-active government, and a waiting market - in the immediate vicinity and abroad.

My own experience has taught me that if you stick to the business you know well, conduct your business seriously as you do at home, and apply proper management techniques, Jerusalem does indeed provide the environment for success.

While my own venture in the Holy City has been most successful and profitable, and I have the satisfaction of creating substantial new employment opportunities, it has also been a great honour and privilege for me to fulfil the holy mitzvah of building in Zion.

A very successful international designer-builder based out of Montreal, David J. Azrieli is president of CanPro Investments. In 1982, he brought the first shopping centre to Israel when he built the Canion Ayalon. He has since opened Canion Hanegev in Beersheva, and the largest centre in the Middle East, the Canion Jerusalem. In 1992 he won the competition for the development of the largest mixed-use project in Tel Aviv. ■

Jewish Quarter Lost

by Elliott Katz

Jerusalem, June 11, 1948 - In the cease-fire announced today, the Old City of Jerusalem was left in Arab hands. The Jewish Quarter was the scene of intense fighting as heavily outnumbered Jewish fighters were besieged by Arab troops. With their supplies of food and ammunition exhausted, the Jews surrendered on May 27, 1948.

Some 1,300 elderly men, women and children and wounded men, were led out through Zion Gate. A British officer supervising the surrender said, "Where is the Haganah, where are the soldiers? We will be a laughing stock when people hear that the Legion, together with the Iraqi and Egyptian soldiers and the Arab National Guard, were held at Bay by these. For days we have been opposed by thousands of fighting men and here we have only old men, women and children." ■

Western Wall Under Jewish Control

by Elliott Katz

Jerusalem, June 7, 1967 - This morning from his half-track in front of the Inter-Continental Hotel on the Mount of Olives, Colonel Mordechai Gur ordered, "To commanders of all regiments. We are going up to the Old City, to the Temple Mount, to the Western Wall. For two thousand years our people have prayed for this moment. Israel is awaiting our victory. Let us go forward."

Israeli troops burst through Lion's Gate and entered the Old City. At 10:15 Gur radioed to headquarters, "The Temple Mount is ours. Repeat: The Temple Mount is in our hands."

A group of paratroopers rushed through the narrow streets. One of them broke through a small doorway and yelled, "The Western Wall, I can see the Western Wall."

For the first time since the Bar-Kochba revolt was suppressed in the year 135, the Western Wall was under Jewish control. As the news spread quickly throughout Israel, people wept openly and danced for joy in the streets.

"Our true objective was no longer the taking of this strategic position or that important network, it was the liberation of history itself," Gur later said. "We were on our way to keep an appointment, and we went running, breathless, our hearts pounding." ■

Jerusalem 3000 Festivities Throughout 95/96

by Elana Carr
Special to The Times

The Israeli government will officially launch Jerusalem 3000 in September 1995 at a gala celebration near the Western Wall, and continue through December 1996 with a wide variety of unique events and performances. From King David's Feast, a monumental banquet, to a lavish production of Verdi's opera Nabucco, to historical pageants, concerts, and sound and light shows, there is something planned to suit everyone.

The Canadian Committee for Jerusalem 3000, chaired by Neri Bloomfield, will be hosting a simultaneous launching of Jerusalem 3000 in September 1995. Numerous organizations within the Canadian Jewish community are also honouring this momentous occasion.

During the week of June 2-9, 1996, a strong Canadian presence will be felt in Israel, as the Canadian Committee hosts Canada Week, featuring an array of festive programs, exhibitions, tours, and a ballet and modern dance performance by Le Don des Etoiles, representing top Canadian and international performers. Additionally, there are a variety of special youth activities including a student pen-pal project between Canada and Jerusalem, and an international Jerusalem song competition.

For more information, please contact The Canadian Committee for Jerusalem 3000 at (514) 486-9526. ■

JERUSALEM:
What's in a name?

by Sylvia Papernick

To commemorate the 3,000th anniversary of King David's proclamation of Jerusalem as the Jewish capital, let us take a closer look at this wondrous city's name.

J Jews — No other group yearns for Jerusalem as vigorously.

E East — Throughout the diaspora, we face east to Jerusalem during prayer. Jerusalem is always in our thoughts.

R Ruth — Great grandmother of David, a devoted and righteous woman.

U Uzzah — Lost his life trying to protect the Holy Ark in transport to Jerusalem.

S Solomon — Son of David, second King of Israel. He built the first temple in Jerusalem.

A Absalom — When lost at battle, he was greatly mourned by his father, David.

L Levites — Maintained the Temple and its sacred vessels.

E Egged — The modern day chariots that transport us from the hills of Judea into the streets of Jerusalem. With every turn of the wheel, we are that much closer to her sanctity.

M Mashiach — "The anointed one", he will be a descendant of King David. His arrival will mark the time when all Jews will come together, to rejoice in the peace and brotherhood that is Jerusalem.

"If I forget thee, O Jerusalem"

Jerusalem:
Eye of the Universe

by Rabbi Aryeh Kaplan

Imagine yourself in Jerusalem two thousand years ago. It is the festival of Passover, and Jews from all over the world are coming to celebrate the holy season. They come from every direction, first by hundreds, then by thousands, and finally by hundreds of thousands. When the festival arrives a good portion of the entire Jewish population is concentrated in this one city. As far as the eye can see, the mountain slopes are covered with tents, where people will roast their Paschal Lamb, which in the time of the Temple was the focal point of the Passover service.

Two holy days are observed by virtually every Jew: Yom Kippur and Passover, two of the most significant days of the Jewish calendar. The most dramatic part of the Yom Kippur service occurs at the close of the day, just as the service is about to end. To announce the conclusion of this most sacred day, a long clear blast is sounded on the Shofar. The congregation responds, "Next year in Jerusalem!" The Passover Seder is also one of the most meaningful rituals of the Jewish year. It is observed at home rather than in the synagogue. And here, too, the service ends with the words, "Next year in Jerusalem!"

At the conclusion of every Jewish wedding ceremony, it is customary for the groom to break a glass. Among Ashkenazic (Northern European) Jews, the custom is to shout Mazel Tov at this point. But Sephardic (Southern European) Jews recite the verse, "If I forget you O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget its cunning," (Psalms 137:5). The glass is broken so that even at the happiest moment of their lives, the bride and groom should recall the destruction of Jerusalem. This is in keeping with the next verse, "Let my tongue stick to my palate if I remember you not, if I set not Jerusalem above my greatest joy."

Every synagogue in the world is built facing Jerusalem. Since both Europe and the United States are west of Jerusalem, their synagogues were traditionally built facing east. But in any part of the world, when a synagogue is built, it always faces Jerusalem. Thus, whenever a Jew prays, he faces this Holy City.

Rabbi Nachman said, "Wherever I go, I go to Jerusalem." And so it is for every Jew. The eternal message of Jerusalem accompanies the Jew every day of his life. He longs for Jerusalem the 'city of peace' to find its complete fulfillment. He mourns for its Temple temporarily removed from its people.

Daily we pray for Jerusalem "the mother of Israel." She is brought to mind when we thank G-d for our food, in our Sabbath and holy-day observances, and in our prayers. Even when we paint and plaster our homes we leave an empty space to recall Jerusalem. We are in love with Jerusalem. It is this love which causes us to call upon her at every opportunity. We cannot remove her from our thoughts. As the Talmud relates: "Ten measures of beauty descended to this world. Nine were given to Jerusalem and one to the rest of the world."

Nachmanides wins debate, runs for life

by Elliott Katz

Jerusalem, September 1, 1267 c.e. – Rabbi Moses ben Nachman (aka Nachmanides and the Ramban) arrived in Jerusalem yesterday, after being forced to flee Spain for winning a public debate against Pablo Christiani about whether the Messiah had already come.

"Our feet are standing within thy gates, O Jerusalem," Nachmanides, 73, recited from Psalm 122, as he entered the city, established a synagogue, and began rebuilding Jerusalem.

As leader of the Jewish community during Spain's Golden Era, the philosopher and kabbalist was ordered by King James of Aragon to enter into a public disputation with Pablo Christiani, a Jew who became a Christian and was trying to convert Spain's Jews.

The disputation began on July 20, 1263. Although Nachmanides clearly had the upper hand, Pablo claimed victory and kept trying to convert Jews. Nachmanides wrote his account and his opponents charged it was blasphemous. He was tried before the King and banished. In the fall of 1264 he set out for Jerusalem.

When he saw the devastation of Jerusalem left by the Mongols in 1260, he tore his clothing in mourning. At the Western Wall, he tore his clothes again in remembrance of the destruction of the Temple.

"And what shall I tell you with regard to the land? Many are its forsaken places, and great the wastes," Nachmanides noted. "The heart of the matter is: the more sacred the place the greater the devastation it has suffered. Jerusalem is more desolate than all, Judea more than the Galilee. Yet in all its destruction it is an exceedingly good land." ■

Jerusalem:
The Future of the Past

by Moshe Safdie

It is a gold city. Jerusalem the Golden is the Jerusalem of yellow-gold limestone. I know of no city with quite that color of stone which is made more intensely golden by the clean air, strong sun and deep blue sky.

Jerusalem has a sensual skyline. Out of the strong framework of the city walls rise two great domes, the Dome of the Rock and al-Aksa mosque, one golden, the other silver, along with hundreds more domes of varied shapes. In the main however, the texture of Jerusalem is soft and feminine. Where you would normally think of the fabric of a city as being made up of buildings standing along the edges of streets, it would be more accurate to think of Old Jerusalem as a mass of intricately carved stone. It is as if nature had deposited a solid layer of limestone three or four storeys high which followed the curves and contours of the landscape. Then, with a chisel, man cut away alleys, passages, stair ramps, courtyards and terraces.

Jerusalem forms a human mosaic. In the old City you start with the great diversity of native people. There are Armenian priests in their black robes and black pointed hoods; members of Roman Catholic orders, some with brown gowns, some with gray, mostly bareheaded; Ethiopians, black-skinned, in black robes and square hats; imams with their white turbans and light robes; Hasidic Jews with their fur-rimmed hats and black coats; Sephardic Rabbis, often bearded but without sidelocks, always dressed in black; and civilian Israelis, some in suits and ties but most dressed in slacks and open-necked shirts; and the soldiers in uniform, with slung rifles or submachine guns, some dark, others blond with blue eyes or even redheaded. And then there are the tourists: the typical American tourists, armed with two cameras, wear loud shirts, and blue and white hats bought in tourist shops.

As the people of the city look different, they also move differently: The Hasidic Jews stride along with nervous energy; the farmers, with produce on their heads, sway like camels through the markets, the tourists loiter; the children scamper.

In the markets, sounds of donkeys swinging their bells, and always the voices of merchants, echo off the hard stone surfaces. As you move out of the main markets the sounds change to the cries of playing children and barking dogs. And as one moves toward the southeast corner of the Old City and Western Wall, the sounds of praying become louder. This sound changes, too - from the sound of singing and the piercing cry of women on Mondays and Thursdays as Bar Mitzvahs or other festive occasions are celebrated to the wailing and moaning from just before Rosh Hashanah, until Yom Kippur.

But by far the most beautiful moments for me in Jerusalem are when the golden-hued city glows at dusk and the sounds of church bells ringing, the muezzins chanting, and Jews praying at the Wall, all blend together. As they intermingle with the sounds of the street, and as you stand anywhere in the city, you will find yourself listening to a wonderful symphony.

One cannot build with indifference in Jerusalem. It requires either an act of arrogance - building boldly as Solomon and Herod did - or of aggression - demolishing the old fabric and building anew as the Romans and Umayyads did; or it demands humility - absorbing the past, reflecting upon it, respecting it, as one considers the present and the future.

Hundreds Of Students Flock To Jerusalem

by Elana Carr
Staff Reporter

Each summer, hundreds of young adults aged 19-29, participate in The Jerusalem Fellowships, a dynamic four-week program of study and touring for a group of hand-picked future Jewish leaders. Based in Jerusalem, the Fellowships provides an opportunity for participants to experience the culture and politics of Israel, learn about vital issues confronting Jewish people, and explore their heritage.

Since its inception in 1981, over 1,200 bright, talented people from countries including Canada, the U.S., England, South Africa and Australia have been awarded Fellowships. Through learning with top scholars, rabbis, and politicians, these young adults gain valuable insights and inspiration. Past participants have met with Yitzchak Rabin, Yitzchak Shamir, Benjamin Netanyahu and other top Israeli leaders. The Fellowships also offers a two-week program in December.

In honour of Jerusalem 3000 you, or someone you know, can experience The Jerusalem Fellowships of 1995/96 and discover the wonders of the world's most exciting city, just as King David did 3,000 years ago. Space is still available for this summer. For more information, please call (416) 636-7530 or 1-800-FELLOWS. ■

The King David Quiz

by Allan Gould

It's not every day that a city turns 3000, you'll have to admit, and if Rome wasn't built in a day, you can just imagine how long it took to not build Jerusalem. Or to rebuild it, for that matter.

In the interest of furthering the education of us all - an eternal concern of the Jews, even if we tend to underpay our Hebrew teachers - I've created a Quiz on King David, who had a great deal to do with the founding of Jerusalem, the magnificent city (that has great felafel, by the way) which we are celebrating on June 18th. Please close your books and keep your eyes on your own paper. Nu - Moishe!! I told you to take that gum out of your mouth! Okay . . . begin!!

1. Sports were important at the time of King David. The most memorable final scores in his life were:
   a. Chronicles II, Samuel I
   b. Samuel II, Chronicles I
   c. Chronicles II, Kings I
   d. all of the above

2. Once David took the throne of the Jewish people:
   a. he reigned 40 years, in the 2nd book of Samuel
   b. no, it rained 40 days, in the story of Noah
   c. can I take this class in summer school?

3. The Book of Samuel tells us that the young David was:
   a. "skillful in playing music"
   b. "a man of valour"
   c. "prudent in speech"
   d. "a man of good presence"
   e. "a good-looking kid with a 3.9 average in school and a pretty fine poet too, even if the shepherd profession was rather limited in advancement possibilities at the time.

4. One famous accomplishment of the young David was that he:
   a. defeated the huge Philistine, Goliath
   b. became best friends with Saul's oldest son Jonathan
   c. enraged King Saul to the point that he wanted to kill the young man
   d. And you thought that your family had tensions?

5. When David was anointed king of Israel and of Judah, he soon:
   a. fought against the Moabites
   b. struggled against the Arameans
   c. routed the Ammonites
   d. conquered the Edomites
   e. was continually bothered by his own balabatim

6. When King David finally captured Jerusalem, he:
   a. put a down-payment on a great location in Rehavia
   b. turned the city into the residence of the King
   c. founded an order of warriors, such as Benaiah, son of Jehoiada, who headed the Cherethites and Pelethites
   d. Say item "c" (above) quickly five times, and get an "A" grade!
   e. made preparations for the building of the Temple
   f. managed to pay off the mortgage on an earlier Temple

7. While David moved to centralize both power and religious observance in Jerusalem:
   a. his son Absalom rebelled against him
   b. the Benjamites pushed for revenge
   c. the men of Hebron rose up against the King
   d. there was an uprising by Sheba, son of Bichri
   e. Doesn't this sound a lot like your shul board?

8. Later, in David's old age:
   a. his fourth son, Adonijah, son of Haggith, expected to inherit the Kingdom
   b. Solomon, son of Batsheba, was promised the throne
   c. And people wonder why family businesses rarely survive into the third generation!

9. Looking back on King David's life, it is undeniable that :
   a. he was one of the strongest men of all time
   b. he was one of the greatest poets of all time
   c. he was a brilliant administrator and warrior
   d. he turned Jerusalem into the Eternal Capital of the Jews
   e. he was the kind of Jewish lad who any mother would be proud of, any mother-in-law would kvell over, and whose followers would still cause endless heartache and tzures. But then, we Jews are that way, right?

Allan Gould is the author of 22 books, including the humourous Unorthodox Book of Jewish Records and Lists and the very serious and scholarly What Did They Think of the Jews? He is honoured to support Aish HaTorah's Jerusalem 3000 Celebration, and believes that King David was a remarkable man, if only because he tried to unite the Jews, which can be pretty thankless. He also needs a good, low-priced apartment to rent in Jerusalem this summer. ■

Achad

Your First Choice in Dining

by Yona Katz Food Critic

Jerusalem 2760 - Today, Jerusalem's first restaurant opened to rave reviews, huge line-ups and delectable cuisine. Appropriately named Achad (One), the restaurant's owners, Yishy and Devorah, were on hand to greet diners and help serve dinner.

The falafels were crispy, the pita delicious and the tahina tangy. Indeed, the flavour and pizazz of Jerusalem's culture were on display for all to taste. The crowds arrived in camel-drawn carriages and waited patiently while the chef prepared spicy shish-ka-bobs and scrumptious shwarmas.

Jerusalem's glitterai, comprised of local celebrities and palace notables, were also on hand. The best table in the house was occupied by none other than the fashion world's toga designers' Chanelstein and Valentinberg. King David's right hand man could also be seen hob-nobbing with the crowd.

Decorated in dark red sack cloth and accented with natural vines and shrubbery, the atmosphere was at once luxurious and rustic. Some couples even found it fitting to bring their farm animals along. Two chickens could be seen pecking at one table's leftovers, while at least one goat could be heard feasting on vegetable scraps in the kitchen.

All in all, Achad captivated the crowds with its ambience, menu and service, at the affordable price of one shekel. ■

Jerusalem Fell To Israel By A Clever Stratagem

Jerusalem, 2756 — The fortress city of Jerusalem stands at a height of some two thousand cubits above the Great Sea and 300 cubits above the surrounding valley. The only approaches are by steep precipitous rocks, and even when these are scaled, the walls of the city have always successfully defied a conqueror.

These considerations must have been very much in the minds of the Jebusites four months ago when the forces of King David appeared before the walls and challenged them to surrender. They shut the gates in derision and called out to David and his men that the lame could defend the city.

Strange Offer

David immediately proclaimed to his host that whosoever would take the city would be commander-in-chief of his armies. This was a curious offer, since Joab already held that position. Rumours suggest that the King, feeling himself at odds with Joab, used this as an attempt to supplant him, without incurring the anger of the troops. Others say that the gesture was pre-arranged with Joab and was meant to inflame the men with ambition.

Whatever the explanation, the fact is that, spurred on by the taunt of the Jebusites, David's forces soon took the lower regions and outer defences of the city, the enemy retreating to the citadel. This was much more difficult to take. It could not be stormed, and by all military standards the defences were impregnable.

Attack from the Rear

Thus David's troops were presented with what seemed to be an insoluble problem. There was only man in the country who could be expected to deal with it, and that was Joab. Perhaps David knew this when he made this proclamation.

Drawing off his men a little as though preparing to retreat, Joab took time off to study the position. Suddenly he had the solution.

Whence did the citadel get its water? Where water could enter, an intrepid man could also. He searched around and discovered a deep shaft, sunk some 80 cubits and meeting an aqueduct. Taking a few chosen men, he ascended the shaft, moving silently and grimly upward, scaling its almost smooth face with indomitable persistence.

The noise of rioting and premature triumph made by the Jebusites effectively drowned any noise they made. The mouth of the shaft was unprotected. Joab and his company emerged swiftly and with the overwhelming and stupefying advantage of surprise, cut their way remorselessly to the gates which they swung wide open to admit David's victorious hosts.

Jebusites Spared

The swift victory has a pleasant sequel. Had a long and bitter siege taken place, bad feeling and bitter enmity would have beeb kindled on both sides. As it was, David could afford to be magnanimous, and the Jebusites could console themselves with the thought that they had not been shown wanting in military prowess but, rather, had been defeated by Joab's clever move. All they could be accused of was a lack of foresight; but in three centuries no one before had thought of mounting a guard on the watershaft.

Accordingly, the lives of the Jebusites were spared. They continue to inhabit their portion of the city peacefully and so far have not given us the least cause for anxiety.

The new Dan Family Aish HaTorah Community Centre on Clark Avenue in Thornhill is taking shape! See Story on Page 27.

For Men of Vision

The story goes that during the conference among the leaders of the people to determine the site for the new capital, a number of people were opposed to the idea of making Jerusalem the first city, because the water supply was inadequate, due to the city's location away from both river and sea.

In answer, Nathan the prophet told these men that the residents of Jerusalem would become accustomed to looking out over great distances; in time, he said, they will see not only in the physical sense - but also the spirit of man through boundless distance of time. Jerusalem will be the place for the prophets of peace and the men of vision.

"So, you see," Nathan is said to have concluded, " water is not the issue."

Aish HaTorah: Creating Jewish Commitment Through Education

AT LEFT
Having fun last summer at the Aish picnic are (L - R) Jeff Bernholtz, Murray Nightingale, and Sol Jakubowicz.

Purim at Aish Thornhill!

Internationally, Aish HaTorah is on the front lines in the battle for Jewish continuity. More than 100,000 lives around the world have been touched with the depth, relevance and beauty of Jewish life. Our goal is a worldwide renaissance of the Jewish people. From all over the world, and from all backgrounds, we have come together for a common cause: to strengthen the Jewish People through educational programs that enhance Jewish pride.

Founded in 1974 in Jerusalem by Rabbi Noah Weinberg, Aish HaTorah's approach has established its reputation as one of the largest and most successful educational outreach programs of its kind in the world. There are currently 13 branches worldwide including Toronto, Jerusalem, Los Angeles, New York, Washington DC, New Jersey, St. Louis, Cleveland, Miami, Detroit, London England, Minsk and Moscow.

Aish HaTorah has reawakened Jewish values, ignited Jewish pride, and promoted Jewish unity through a record number of seminars, classes and public lectures, all designed to meet the diverse needs of individuals from all backgrounds. Aish has proven that a fresh approach to Jewish wisdom, delivered by creative, committed young people, can turn the tides of assimilation.

In recognition of its achievements and ongoing commitment to the Jewish People, the Israeli Government awarded the coveted, last remaining site at the Western Wall to Aish HaTorah for its magnificent new Dan Family of Canada World Center.

"Aish HaTorah" literally means "fire of Torah", and bringing the warmth of Jewish life to every Jewish home is Aish HaTorah's mission. For more information on how to ignite the spark in your heritage, call Aish HaTorah at (416) 636-7530. ■

New Aish World Center In The Heart Of Jerusalem

by Elana Carr
Staff Reporter

In 1985, the Israeli Government awarded the last remaining site at the Western Wall Plaza in Jerusalem to Aish HaTorah, in recognition of its achievements and efforts in Jewish outreach, learning and leadership. In October of 1994, the Dan Family of Canada Building of the Aish HaTorah World Center was opened.

Rabbi Weinberg, founder and Rosh HaYeshiva of Aish HaTorah, realized the incredible potential of building a centre to provide the thousands of tourists who pass by the Kotel every day, the opportunity to learn about their heritage, in the land where it all began. "The building is a fabulous gift for our work," he says. "Literally millions of Diaspora Jews are drawn to this Wall. More than any other time in their lives, they are seeking to learn about Judaism, and now we can be there for them."

Designed by world renowned Canadian architect Moshe Safdie, the building has the unique historical character of the Old City of Jerusalem combined with modern architecture. In the words of Moshe Safdie, "Jerusalem is a powerful, spiritual place, and the challenge of the architectural design was to focus on the Temple Mount and on the Kotel and draw these aspects into the building."

Dr. Itzhak Yofet, an I.D.F. Paratrooper in the Reserves who was one of the heroes who regained control of Jerusalem in 1967 (see photo on pg. 8), commented on the new building. "I think it makes perfect sense and it is quite appropriate that Aish HaTorah is building across from the Western Wall, which was once the Jewish Temple. I think there is a very special atmosphere that the Wall can cast over the students, and this can be reciprocated by the influence (Aish HaTorah) can have over people visiting the Wall."

This new Centre will serve to further Aish HaTorah's goal of ensuring the survival of the Jewish people, by offering a multitude of dynamic programs designed for Jews of all backgrounds.

The site of the Aish HaTorah World Center has been witness to some of the greatest events in Jewish history, and with this new international centre, Aish HaTorah will continue in its worldwide efforts towards strengthening the future of the Jewish people. ■

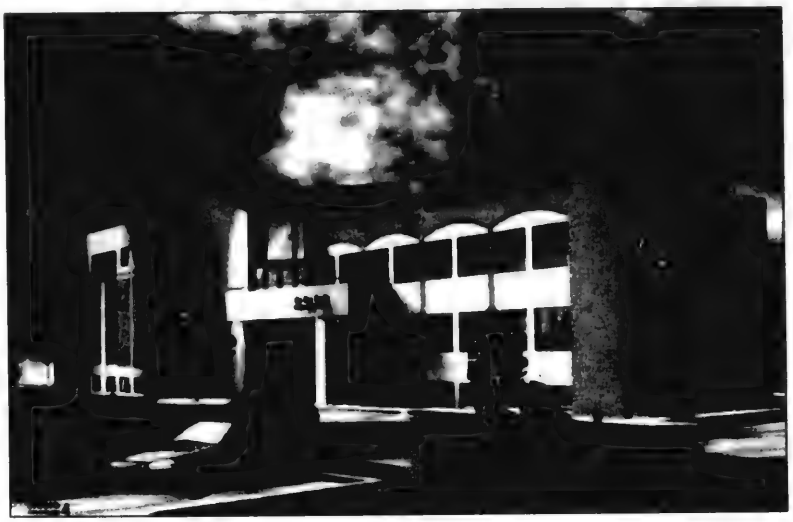
Aish Toronto Branches Out



The Toronto branch of Aish HaTorah has had a significant impact on the local Jewish community since its inception in 1981. Today there are four affiliate locations that attract Jews of all affiliations and backgrounds. These locations, including The Village Shul in Forest Hill, The Uptown Shul in North York, Aish HaTorah Thornhill, and the Country Shul in Richmond Hill, have arisen in neighbourhoods where many young Jewish families are now living. The abundance of programs that Aish Toronto offers, caters to the diversity of interests within the community. Among the wide variety of Jewish learning options are evening Torah classes, Shabbatons, home learning groups, the Women's Advanced Learning Division, Executive Learning Program, children's programs, The Jerusalem Fellowships, Public Lectures with world-renowned educators, singles programming, the weekly Shabbat Shalom Fax, seminars such as Discovery and Why the Jews?, High Holiday programming, annual missions to Israel, and classes ranging from contemporary issues to Jewish parenting to philosophy.

Because the demand for innovative programs and seminars has vastly outgrown Aish HaTorah's current physical resources, construction began late last year on the new Dan Family Aish HaTorah Community Centre, located on Clark Avenue west of Bathurst Street in Thornhill. This beautiful 22,000 square foot facility has been dedicated by Leslie Dan, Chairman of Novopharm, and his family.

"This is a major step forward for Aish HaTorah," says Rabbi Ephraim Shore, Executive Director. "This state-of-the-art facility will be something that the entire Jewish community in the Greater Toronto area will be able to use, and it will give us the opportunity to expand programming and services even more."

Designed in conjunction with Aish Board Member Jack Winston, the 2-1/2 storey Centre will house specially commissioned artwork and provide spacious facilities for community functions, meetings and seminars. The sanctuary will seat 350, and can be used for public lectures in addition to religious services. Aish HaTorah's Canadian head offices will also move in the Centre.

The new Community Centre is scheduled to open in September for the 1995 High Holidays. ■

Levy breaks from Likud

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — MK David Levy declared Sunday that he is setting up "a new political framework, a new movement that will organize into a party." Levy also announced that he will run for prime minister.

Levy appeared before some 4,000 supporters bused in from around the country to a Givatayim hall which has a capacity of only 1,500. The overflow crowd was sent to the roof to watch on a giant screen.

Levy was often interrupted by supporters who sang out, "David, king of Israel." He was kissed, hugged, and offered flowers. The crowd was often so hard to control that Levy shouted: "What do I have to do to talk around here?"

Levy was careful not to state that his as-yet-nameless party was being established now, since that would subject him to political financing laws, inhibiting his ability to raise funds.

Levy took care to present himself as a potential national leader, by devoting a sizable portion of his half-hour speech to the terror attack in Lebanon and to the peace negotiations.

"How long will soldiers fall and northern settlements be held hostage? Not only is [Syrian President Hafez] al-Assad not living up to his undertakings, but he encourages the spilling of Israeli blood...

"The government, which argues that Israel must evince restraint because the terrorists want to provoke a severe reaction to scuttle the peace process, is irresponsible ... A responsible government must protect its soldiers and citizens ... The government must announce that either the terror ceases or the talks stop."

Levy nevertheless strove to place himself in the political centre by vowing "not to be dragged to extremes which imperil national unity."

His new movement, he declared, will "show real concern for social problems. We will seek full equality to allow people to live with respect."

He did not mention or refer to Likud chair Binyamin Netanyahu.

Thousands flock to join Sharansky

'No government will be able to ignore our platform'

By MORDECHAI BEN-DAT

TORONTO — Thousands of Israelis have flocked to join Israel B'aliyah, the social and political movement co-founded by Natan Sharansky last week.

In an exclusive telephone interview last Thursday, Sharansky told The CJN the movement's small office in Jerusalem, manned by volunteers, most of them pensioners, has been overwhelmed by the flow of people. The organization's toll-free number has been ringing constantly.

"Between 1,000 and 2,000 people have been joining us every day. We now expect to have many more members than the 30,000 we had originally predicted."

Sharansky spoke emphatically, constantly underscoring his words with a vigorous pace and unrestrained excitement. While he repeatedly referred to the organization as a movement, he left no doubt during the interview that what was created last week was also the embryo of a political party. "We will not field a candidate in the election for prime minister; but we will have a party list standing for the general election. No prime minister, no government will be able to ignore our platform."

When asked to elaborate upon the party's platform, Sharansky explained that it was rooted firmly within the intellectual and ideological soil of traditional Zionism.

"Zionism," he said, "has two central pillars: building the people of Israel and building the State of Israel."

By building the people of Israel, he said, he meant strengthening the intra-societal bonds both inside Israel and between Israel and the Diaspora. In building the land of Israel, he was referring to the maintaining of inter-national relations between Israel and other states.

CANADA

Karp is Honored

OTTAWA — Community figure Fred Karp last week received a Canada Volunteer Award from Health Minister Diane Marleau.

Karp was honored for his many years of volunteerism at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

Karp was one of 23 Canadians who received the award for "exemplary contributions to the health and social well-being of their communities."

Jack Austin Dies

TORONTO — Jack Austin, the druggist behind Canada's second largest retail pharmaceutical chain, died May 21 of cancer. He was 75.

Austin came to Canada from his native Odessa at age nine. In 1962, he had begun Jack Austin Drugs, which ran more than 150 outlets in Woolco stores across the country. Austin retired in 1981.

Dirnfeld Elected

RICHMOND, B.C. — Dr. Victor Dirnfeld has been elected president of the British Columbia Medical Association. He succeeds another Jewish doctor, Mark Schonfeld of Vancouver.

Born in Winnipeg, Dirnfeld, 57, was a founder of the association that developed into Beth Tikvah Congregation and served for three years on the executive of Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region.

OBC For McVay

VICTORIA — Ken McVay, who has been challenging hate literature and Holocaust denial on the Internet for the past four years, was awarded the Order of British Columbia last week.

Premier Mike Harcourt said McVay "has made a significant contribution to our society in his own special way."

McVay directs a team of 65 volunteers around the world who respond to electronic hate material.

WJCC Changes

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg Jewish Community Council has reduced its size and will introduce electoral changes over the next three years.

The number of council seats will be reduced from 48 elected members and three appointees to 40 total. Of those, 24 will still be elected directly from the community, with the rest to be filled by representatives of the Council of Rabbis, the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba and the Combined Jewish Appeal, as well as by executive appointment.

Society Goes Online

MONTREAL — The Canadian Jewish Historical Society itself made history recently when it transmitted a record of its annual meeting over the Internet.

Summaries of sessions on anti-Semitism in Canada, the future of Quebec Jewry and other subjects were sent out electronically and archived into the World Wide Web, to which millions have access.

The society may be contacted at CJHS-L@oise.on.ca.

ISRAEL

Three Palestinians Killed

JERUSALEM — Israeli soldiers shot dead a wanted Palestinian and two members of an elite PLO unit last Wednesday on the border between Egypt and the Gaza Strip.

Israel Radio reported that two members of Force 17, a unit that provides bodyguards to PLO leader Yasser Arafat, were trying to help a leading member of the Fatah Hawks, the PLO's militia, infiltrate the border with Israel.

"It was wrong," said an Arafat spokesperson of the infiltration attempt. "On the other hand, we can understand the desperation of such an individual."

More Chechens Arrive

JERUSALEM — The Jewish Agency last week flew another 70 Jews here from war-torn Chechnya.

The arrival of the latest group brings to 173 the number of Chechen Jews brought to Israel by the Jewish Agency.

Israel is also flying in about 150 immigrants a month from the Muslim autonomous region of Daghestan, where some 20,000 Jews remain.

MiA Families Visit

JERUSALEM — The families of the three soldiers missing in action since 1982 visited the Knesset last Tuesday to mark the 13th anniversary of their disappearance.

Yona Baumel, father of MiA Zachary Baumel, charged that some politicians, including Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin, openly state that pressing the issue of the MiAs and PoWs will upset the peace process and "others think it, but don't have the courage to say it openly."

Pass the Sunblock

TEL AVIV — Beachgoers here may soon be able to bare it all.

Mayor Ronni Milo said last week he would not raise any objections to a nude beach.

"We have had a special beach for religious people," with separate sections for men and women, he told Ma'ariv. "There is no reason not to have a nudist beach."

The first step to a nude beach was taken recently when the city suspended a bylaw that barred going topless.

WORLD

Memorial Unveiled

BERLIN — A controversial Holocaust memorial in this city's Steglitz district was unveiled recently. The names of 1,723 Jewish residents of Steglitz who were murdered during the Holocaust are carved on a 10- by 4-metre mirrored wall.

The architects wanted viewers to see their own reflections while reading the victims' names.

Front Makes Gains

PARIS — France's Jewish community was dismayed by the strong showing posted by the far-right National Front in last week's first round of country-wide municipal elections.

The Front registered strong showings in working-class suburbs of Paris and Marseilles, in the industrial northern and eastern sectors of France and along the Riviera.

Observers say the group may double or even triple its representation in France's 36,664 town halls.

BJC inaugurated with fanfare

Former JCC completes restructuring

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "This is a re-awakening," said Mayor Mel Lastman as he presented the Bathurst Jewish Centre (BJC) with a scroll from North York Council honoring its reopening and renaming.

"It's officially a reopening, but we never closed," said BJC board chairman Michael Kerbel proudly at a party attended by 250 on the patio recently. As Kerbel remarked, the day's bright sunshine augured well for the BJC future.

"The federal and provincial governments couldn't afford a scroll but we can," joked Lastman. "We're keeping them [the governments] afloat."

A BJC press release said the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto rescued the former Jewish Community Centre (JCC) from possible bankruptcy with a total of $11 million to cover a mortgage on the Bathurst Street property, payment to creditors and replenishment of the JCC's endowment funds. In addition, the federation arranged a privately guaranteed $2.5 million line of credit for the BJC.

Lastman recalled his days as a water polo player at the old Jewish Y on Brunswick Avenue in an interview with The CJN. "My mother made me quit after I got terrible scratches down my body from the toenails of a big fellow in a Hamilton match."

He doesn't run or jog today, but walks a lot to keep in shape, he said.

The mayor said he had more calls to his office from the Jewish community when the JCC financial troubles became known, and some programs were shut down, than at any time since the issue of the expropriation of the York Downs Golf Club to become Earl Bales Park.

"I thank the federation for standing behind us and I think the complete restructuring of the JCC is the right solution," he said in his brief public remarks.

New energy room

Kerbel invited the public to tour the building and see the new energy room for general members which has more than a dozen walking and jogging machines and stationary bicycles and all kinds of strength-building apparatus. The outdoor pool has been improved.

"This is a very special day and you've come through a difficult time," said Sandra Brown, federation president. "Today proves how central your organization is to Jewish life in Toronto and to the cause of Jewish continuity."

Acting United Way president Susan Pigott said she was close to the financial struggles of the JCC and was impressed by the tremendous commitment and skills which resulted in the reopening. "Our relationship goes back to 1956," she reminded the audience.

The ceremonial cake was cut by Joe Starr, newly-elected president of the Seniors Club, and Sari Mogul of the junior kindergarten day-care centre.

JIAS helps 'Soviet' Jews avoid deportation

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Orders to deport 33 Jewish families from the former Soviet Union rejected for refugee status were set aside through the intervention of the Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), according to Robert Kleinman, the president of the organization.

"We were able to overturn the orders and we hope to have them [the refugees] eventually approved as landed immigrants. We believe their fear of persecution if they return is real," Kleinman said in a report to the annual meeting.

JIAS was concerned this year over the decisions of various Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) panels to deny refugee status to some Jewish families who came here directly from the former Soviet Union because, the IRB panels decided, they could go to Israel under the Law of Return.

"This resulted from a misinterpretation of that law," Kleinman said. "The boards thought the law grants dual citizenship and that these applicants would not need refugee status. We're pleased that a recent decision of the IRB correctly interprets the Law of Return."

He also reported that the Canadian visa office in Zagreb, Croatia, will be more flexible in future in allowing parents and grandparents of Bosnian refugees already in Canada to come here, many of them aging people in poor physical shape.

JIAS has expressed its concern to Sergio Marchi, the minister of immigration about restrictions on family reunification.

"We are concerned that family members who are elderly will not be allowed to enter Canada at the same rate as they were in previous years."

On the subject of unduly onerous landing fees, Kleinman said: "Many of our immigrants do not have this money up front. Perhaps a loan or monthly payments could be arranged for them."

Lately, public opinion, "fueled by the media," has pictured immigrants as representing a burden on the community, special guest Marchi said. "They are wrong. Immigrants are builders of the nation.

"Some winds spilling over to Canada have a chilling effect on immigration attitudes," he said. "We must turn them into a kind of Canadian chinook to moderate these winds from California."

Sergio Marchi

An anonymous bequest in 1987 allowed JIAS to give a total of $30,000 in scholarships to Marcia Finchelstein, Ioulia Joffe, Dr. Ilya Kaploun, Ilya Shapiro, Perla Ovadija, Marina Zelter, Galina Zisk, all of Toronto; Ilona Karan of Hamilton, winner of the John Hirsch Award for the Performing Arts; Felix Ovis, Irina Serebrennikova, Boris Vasiliev and Pauline Sabinin, all of Calgary; Greg Belostotski of Edmonton; Irina Fainberg and Vladislav Sandler of Vancouver; and Branko Milosevic, Winnipeg.

A bequest from the late John Hirsch funded scholarships to Igor Gefter and Victoria Maidanik of Toronto.

Kleinman was returned as president, while other national officers are: Norman Mogil, immediate past president; Adrian Albert, vice-president at large; Ian Fine, Ottawa, vice-president (communities); Robert Furman, vice-president, (Toronto); Leslie Borshy, treasurer; Sandy Atlin, secretary.

IRB panels supports claim from Moldova

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A panel of Canada's Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) has shown unusually strong support for Jewish refugee claimants from the ex-Soviet republic of Moldova, says a Toronto immigration lawyer.

In granting the refugee claims of an elderly couple who said they suffered anti-Semitic persecution in Moldova, the two-member panel last week recognized that Jews in the republic cannot get adequate protection, said the couple's lawyer, Sergio Karas.

While the oral comments made by the panel are not binding on other IRB panels, "they recognize that Jews are at great risk in Moldova, and must be rescued," Karas told The CJN. "I've never heard such strong statements from the board. It was very compelling."

Between 40,000 and 50,000 Jews live in Moldova, a small landlocked republic between Romania, Ukraine and the Black Sea. According to documents submitted to the IRB, Jews and other ethnic minorities there, especially Russians and Ukrainians, face regular harassment and discrimination. A popular slogan is "Let's drown the Russians in Jewish blood," the documents state.

The IRB panel also considered a 1992 statement from a Moldovan Jewish leader who said that the lives of the country's Jews are "in serious danger."

While the Moldovan state cannot be accused of being anti-Semitic, it has been "unable" to protect Jews and other minorities from violence, mostly because of police inaction, documents indicated.

The IRB granted the refugee claims of a 69-year-old Jewish woman from Moldova and her 66-year-old husband, a non-Jew. They claimed to have suffered vicious anti-Jewish attacks, harassment and vandalism in the village of Grushka and later in the capital, Kishinev. They claimed refugee status in Canada late last year, arguing the attacks would continue if they returned to Moldova.

Karas said that last year, the IRB granted 231 claims from Moldova, many from Jews, and rejected 108 others.

Hate crimes law welcomed by Jews

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The House of Commons last week passed its controversial hate crimes bill — with hearty support from Jewish groups and often bitter opposition from some members of Parliament.

Despite its contentious inclusion of sexual orientation, Bill C-41 passed 168-51, and now heads to the Senate.

For Jewish organizations, the bill's passage is a significant watershed. The community has long sought stiffer sentences for those found guilty of hate crimes.

The bill calls for harsher punishments for crimes motivated by prejudice against religion, race, ethnic origin, color, sex, age, disability, language and sexual orientation.

That last proviso prompted often rancorous debate among some MPs, who argued that its inclusion in the bill would legitimize homosexuality and offer protection to pedophiles and other sexual deviants.

In the end, four Liberal MPs — Tom Wappel, Roseanne Skoke, Dan McTeague and Paul Steckle — voted against the bill, despite threats of stiff discipline from their party. They were joined by all Reform members. New Democrats and the Bloc Québécois supported the bill.

Vancouver Liberal MP Hedy Fry reminded the House that the Nazi persecution of Jews began as individual acts of violence, like the gay-bashing of today.

In his remarks, Justice Minister Allan Rock noted the support the government received from several organizations, including B'nai Brith Canada and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC).

B'nai Brith and CJC were among the first groups to support the bill's inclusion of sexual orientation, arguing that all Canadians are entitled to protection from hate crimes.

In February, representatives of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights appearing before the Commons' justice committee voiced their support for the bill.

In a statement last week, the League's senior legal counsel, Mark Sandler, said his organization is "delighted" by the bill's passage.

"We welcome the inclusion of sexual orientation ... since it reflects a much delayed recognition that gays and lesbians should no more be the targets of violence than other members of society."

CJC president Goldie Hershon also commended the bill's passage. This week, CJC is scheduled to make submissions to the Senate committee studying the bill.

New laws target hate groups

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Recent successful hate prosecutions have shown that legislation can be written to target hate groups without endangering freedom of speech.

This was the message given to delegates at the annual conference of the Canadian Association of Statutory Human Rights Agencies, held here recently.

Delegates attended sessions on federal and provincial hate laws and on using the media to expose hatemongers.

In British Columbia, which is home to an estimated 32 hate groups, the government two years ago broadened the provincial Human Rights Act to include hatemongering in addition to discrimination, said Harinder Mahil, chair of the British Columbia Council of Human Rights.

In Saskatchewan, hate laws led to the successful prosecution of a motorcycle shop owner selling stickers caricaturing blacks, Asians and natives.

And the Alberta Human Rights Commission prosecuted White Aryan leader Terry Long following an Aryan festival replete with cross burning and swastikas. Long and his group were ordered to pay $700,000 to cover the cost of the investigation, a penalty which indirectly put him out of business.

In another session, participants were told to proactively use the media against hatemongers. "We have to be able to take strong positions put in a dramatic way, just as the extreme right does, to capture the media's attention," said Jon Breen, chair of the Yukon Human Rights Commission.

בעוד כשנה וקצת יתקיימו בישראל הבחירות ודומה שהפעם יצביעו הישראלים על שאלות קיומיות מאוד, כמו החזרת רמת הגולן והחזרת/השארת חלקים בגדה המערבית. הדעות בעד ונגד מוכרות היטב לכולנו ואין טעם לחזור עליהן. מה שמרתק אותי יותר היא הצורה שבה עובדת הדמוקרטיה הישראלית. כפי שהדברים נראים עכשיו, מצפות לנו בנוסף לשתי המפלגות הגדולות (עבודה וליכוד) לפחות עוד שלוש מפלגות חדשות שיפצלו משמעותית את היכולת להגיע לרוב כלשהוא : מפלגת ה"דרך השלישית" שעיקר עניינה למנוע החזרת הגולן ; מפלגתו בדרך של דוד לוי שאינו מוכן לקבל את הדרך שבה מתקבלות הכרעות בליכוד ; וכמעט בטוח - מפלגה של עולי רוסיה, ואולי שתיים או שלוש כאלה. לכל אלה יש לחוסיף כמובן את שפע המפלגות החילוניות והדתיות הקיימות בפועל, והרי לפניך תשבץ מורכב מאוד. העם היהודי ידוע בדעותיו הרבות, שהיו מקור לגאווה והוכחה לאופי הדמוקראטי שלנו, אבל מצד שני - הפילוגים הרבים הביאו לתולשה ברגעים קריטיים, וכבר אמרו חכמים ש"על שנאת אחים תרב בית המקדש". הדוגמא חטריה ביותר לשאלוניה של שנאת אחים היא רצונם של נטורי קרטא להשתייך למדינה הפלשתינאית ולא לישראל, והעבדה שהם מתאבלים בכל יום עצמאות וקוראים את דגלי ישראל. כתוצאה מכך שלכל קבוצת אינטרסים קטנה יש מפלגה משלה - שום ראש ממשלה , וגם המוכשר שבהם, אינו יכול לקבל החלטות חשובות בלי לנשק את ידיו של אדמו"ר זה ואדמו"ר אחר. כשניסו ללענג לו על כך ענה רבין ולדעתי בצדק : מה אתם רוצים, זו "גוגליציה" כפי שהיא קיימת במדינת ישראל. שוב - ההשוואה לקנדה מתבקשת: תראו איך שיטת הבחירות האזורית עובדת יפה וחלק ! נותנים לכל אחד ציאנס לארבע חמש שנים, ובאותה תקופה אין הוא חייב לעשות וויתורים שטותיים לשום רב ולשום קבוצת לחץ. הצליח - הצליח; נכשל - הוא יכול להאשים רק את עצמו.

אפרופו תור : איש צעיר פנה לזה שעומד אחריו בתור לקולנוע בתל-אביב ואומר לו: "תוכל לשמור לי את התור? אני מוכרח ללכת לשירותים !" . מציע לו זה שאחריו :"במקום ללכת לשירותים תעשה את זה בכיס של זה שעומד לפניך!" מתפלא הצעיר : " וחוא לא ירגישו?" עונה לו זה שמאחוריו : " מה, ואתה הרגשת?"

Hategan unravels Bristow 'yarn'

Scene in Ottawa

By RICHARD CLEROUX

OTTAWA — The story the federal government put out last year on the Grant Bristow affair is beginning to unravel like a cheap sweater.

The latest piece of yarn was plucked out by Elisse Hategan, a former neo-Nazi Heritage Front member who helped Bristow mount harassment campaigns against Toronto anti-racists two years ago.

Hategan, 20, who defected from the racist group around that time, was the star witness before the parliamentary sub-committee into national security here last week.

What she told MPs about Bristow was disturbingly at odds with the conclusions reached by the Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC) in its report last December. SIRC had been asked by the government to fully investigate the Bristow affair.

In its report, SIRC made Bristow out to be a brash, impulsive but useful spy who went along with the sometimes violent racist activities of the Heritage Front so he could pick up information.

SIRC said Bristow went too far at times, harassing people over the telephone, and he certainly should not have been spying on the Reform Party, but it concluded he wasn't such a bad fellow after all.

In fact, SIRC added, Bristow "deserved Canada's thanks" because he gave information on the Heritage Front to police.

Hategan told a totally different story about the Grant Bristow she knew inside the hate movement.

She described him as anything but a minor player. "Grant Bristow was the coach and designer of the campaign" that spread terror among anti-racist group members in Toronto in the winter of 1992-93, she testified.

He helped teach young neo-Nazis how to collect information on individuals (Jews were favorite targets, along with leftists and anti-racists), how to conduct surveillance and staking operations on selected victims, and how to use the telephone to wage psychological warfare against "enemies."

At a meeting on June 11, 1993, Bristow urged Front members to attack the homes of anti-racists, suggesting everything from dumping excrement on their properties to fire-bombing their homes, she testified.

Hategan categorically rejected the main conclusions of the SIRC report. Far from deserving Canada's thanks, Bristow should be behind bars, she said afterwards.

"This man was given taxpayers' money to harass and stalk and threaten taxpayers," she said. "He should be in the Don Jail [in Toronto] right now."

Hategan's testimony in Federal Court since her defection has helped put three Heritage Front leaders behind bars. By contrast, Bristow (despite his $60,000 a year salary from the Canadian Security Intelligence Service) has never testified in open court against his former Front friends.

(Among Hategan's more explosive allegations was that at least one officer of the Metro Toronto Police force was a Front member. She also said the head of Metro force's hate crimes unit regularly checked out left-wing activists with Front members.

Elisse Hategan

The CJN's calls to the force's media relations section were referred to Det.-Sgt. Wayne Cotgreave of the intelligence unit, who did not return the paper's telephone calls last week.)

Hategan is now living in hiding, fearing revenge from Front members. Bristow is being taken care of by CSIS, living under a new identity provided for him.

Hategan's testimony parallels information she gave Ontario Provincial Police two years ago, shortly after she defected, as well as information contained in 50 affidavits she signed detailing her Heritage Front activities. This is all information SIRC could have obtained from her lawyer Paul Copeland before it absolved Bristow.

Hategan calls the SIRC report on Bristow "a whitewash and a coverup." She has a point.

Her testimony is all the more damaging to the government's stand-pat line on Bristow because last February, two months after the SIRC report came out, the Heritage Front, which continues to exist, though somewhat restrained in its activities nowadays, put out its own video on Grant Bristow.

The Front's 90-minute video (which it is selling publicly to raise money for its racist causes) shows Grant Bristow as an eloquent platform orator and fundraiser exhorting the shock troops to donate more money to the cause. At one point, he invites members to learn how to conduct dirty tricks against the Front's targets.

Both the video and Hategan's testimony have put in doubt the government's story. It appears now that Bristow was not simply the follower the government would have us believe. The latest evidence indicates that:

Bristow didn't just go along with operations against anti-racist groups. He helped initiate, plan and execute the violent encounter;

Bristow did collect information on people. What he did with it remains to be discovered;

Bristow did not passively go along with violence. He incited members to violence.

Hategan said only a full public inquiry with Bristow in the witness box could get to the bottom of what really happened.

She may be right.

A clear statement

Bill C-41 was passed last week in the House of Commons by a vote of 168 to 41. It attempts to change somewhat the approach by the courts to sentencing individuals convicted of criminal offenses. The bill rests essentially on two planks for its philosophical underpinning: that victims of crime will no longer be faceless and nameless before the court; and that in appropriate circumstances prison will be a punishment of last, not first, resort.

But the public may be excused for not being aware of the philosophical reach of the legislation. For virtually all media attention has been devoted to the debate surrounding the provision in the amendment which calls for harsher penalties to be meted out by the court when the Crown attorney can prove that the crime was motivated by hatred directed at the victim due to his or her race, ethnic origin, language, color, religion, sex, age, mental or physical disability, or sexual orientation.

As a result, any light which might have informed and educated the public about the deeper merits of the bill was deflected away from the bill's true purpose and was focused onto a false one, namely, that it conferred an indirect approval of homosexuality.

The amendment was not about homosexuality; it was about hatred. It was about the uniquely vile form of hatred inspired by bigotry and prejudice. It was about the random, violent crime which injures human beings, strikes fear into their hearts and then, in the final degradation, also humiliates them.

The federal government decided to send a clear signal to the "hoodlums and thugs" in our midst. Violence will not be tolerated in Canadian society. And in particular, violence directed at minorities because they are minorities, will be reproached and punished even more severely.

For this clear statement of will and determination we commend the government.

The humility of leadership

Last week we wrote in this space that we view as an ominous development the increasing tendency within the community, both in the Diaspora and in Israel, to convert the important debate about the peace process — a watershed of historical moment, complicated issues and uncertain outcomes — into a campaign of ad hominem argumentation and personal vilification.

In this issue, we comment further upon this development. We have asked two writers, David Newman of Beersheva and Hillel Neuer of Montreal to explore the limits, if any, of "criticizing Israel from afar."

Newman is an Israeli completing a two-year tour of academic exchange in the Diaspora; Neuer is a Canadian. They do not share political ideologies. Indeed, they take a different approach to the weighty substantive issues raised in the peace process. But they arrive at conclusions about the manner of the Diaspora debate which are worthy of reprinting, both for their similarity and, in our view, their cogency.

Newman writes that "the tone of the debate in the Diaspora needs to be lowered, with the more vociferous and vehement parts of the debate being left for the citizens of Israel themselves."

Neuer urges the reader, inter alia, not to lecture "Israelis on how to be better Zionists without absorbing a good dose of humility beforehand."

We agree with both propositions. Israel's interests are best served in the long and the short run through community discourse marked by civility and respect. The issues are life-and-death and the path still marked by too many uncertainties for the debate to focus on personalities and the debaters to adopt self-righteous postures.

The people who purport to be leaders, who write on the peace process by sneering at the democratically elected government of Israel, who speak out on the process by denigrating the "other side," merely divide the community and ultimately cause it harm.

An idea is no less forcefully argued if it is respectfully and humbly argued. The proof of this can be found in the parshah, Beha'alotecha (Bamidbar 12:3), which was read only last week in synagogue. "And the man Moshe was very humble, (more) than any man on earth."

This is a lesson which the participants in the peace process debate must learn. Humility is leadership's companion; not its adversary.

Searching for a very dear friend

In Warsaw during January 1943, when only the remnants of the Jewish Ghetto were left, my brother-in-law Max was running for cover when he met an old friend by the name of Jakob Brzezinski. Jakob asked him to be present at his wedding that very day. He was marrying his long lost girlfriend, Sala. They both insisted on being married under a chupah in the Jewish tradition, even under such circumstances. From that day Sala and Jakob became our very close friends. We all lived together in hiding at 58 Mila St.

A few weeks later, when the Jewish uprising started, Max was killed. Jakob and his wife Sala continued to stay at our side. Not long after that we were taken by the Nazis. My sister and her child were taken away from me in Majdanek. In Majdanek I met Sala again. Jakob's whereabouts were unknown to us.

From Majdanek we were sent to Birkenau. During the big selection in November 1943, Sala and her friend Marysia ran to hide in the chimney. They were found and taken out, their bodies black with soot. The look of the girls tickled the fancy of Mengeles and the other SS. For some bizare reason their lives were spared, when 80 per cent of the inmates of their block were murdered.

After the death march in January 1945, we met again in Malchow. Sala was working in the ammunition factory. At the end of April 1945, she was taken out of Malchow by the Red Cross. We lost track of each other. After the war I wrote to the Red Cross — not knowing her maiden name. I wrote Sala Brzezinski, Warsaw, Solec.

I recently traveled to Ravensbruck, and placed flyers with her name all over the camp. I was unable to visit Malchow, where perhaps I might have been given some information about Sala, from some former inmates who were visiting. I pray and hope that one day I will find her, or someone who knows her, or what became of her.

Cannot accept blanket whitewashing

Rabbi Bulka doesn't need me (or anyone else) to defend him. However, Frank Bialystok makes so much fuss over "facts" that I think he should get his facts straight first. He should also be aware that sins of omission are as bad as those of commission.

As he writes, the Polish state did not exist during the Nazi occupation. Therefore, such an entity could not have helped the Nazis. However the Polish people certainly did continue to exist, and here the story — as told by many witnesses, including my survivor wife — tells us what Bialystok forgets.

He writes: "As for Poles, most were bystanders to the Holocaust, some profited from it, and a relatively small number tried to rescue Jews." Mr. Bialystok, what about those who did help the Nazis? Was there no such category? Not one single individual who betrayed his neighbor? Ask my wife what happened to her father — and perhaps her brother too. How about those who helped hunt Jews or who murdered Jews hiding in the forests and elsewhere?

And let us not forget those friendly Poles who killed Jews even after the war. In blatant pogroms and individual anti-Semitic incidents all over Poland, in the seven months following the end of the war over 350 Jews, survivors of the camps, were brutally murdered, as in the infamous blood libel at Kielce, where 42 were slaughtered. (See The Holocaust, by Martin Gilbert.) Mr. Gilbert also states that "No town in Poland was free of such incidents."

I certainly would not want to condemn the entire Polish nation for the sins of an unknown fraction. However, neither can I accept blanket whitewashing of all the guilty ones as Bialystok tries to do.

Yitzhak Kalin
Ottawa

Defends his views on Poland and Jews

Rabbi Bulka and Dr. Pfefferkorn, in their letters to The CJN June 8, engage in egregious distortions with respect to their comments on Poland and the Holocaust.

Rabbi Bulka is right in calling for a "cooperative dialogue with Poles ... that cannot be based on ignoring or distorting the past." Yet, he does exactly that in confusing the centuries old anti-Semitism that permeated Poland with Poland's role in aiding the Nazis. Again, he conflates "Poland" (which did not exist as a nation-state during the war) with "Poles," by citing Prof. Trunk's comments. Yet, he is either ignorant, or dismissive, of Emmanuel Ringelblum's review of the Jewish police in the Warsaw Ghetto in December 1942 when he wrote: "The Jewish Polish Police had a bad reputation even before the deportation. Unlike the Polish Police, which did not take part in the abductions for the labor camps, the Jewish Police did engage in this dirty work." (Ktovim, Vol. II, p. 31). The issue is not whether the Poles were violent collaborators and the Jews were the saintly victims, but that the murderous regime imposed by the Germans (not Nazis) created situations where individuals had to make choiceless choices. Yes, Poles must be aware of the past and foreswear anti-Semitism, but Jews must also understand the complexity of the regime that made them the principal victims.

Dr. Pfefferkorn, a noted scholar of the Holocaust, should know better than to cite statistics out of context. The number of Poles cited by him are those who are honored as Righteous Among the Nations by Yad Vashem, and not the number that tried to rescue Jews. According to Mordechai Paldiel, the director of this project, there are some 8,600 individuals who are recognized, but well over 100,000 are worthy of the title. That Poland represents some 40 per cent of those honored (the most of any single nation) projects to some 40,000 or more who tried to save Jews. As a percentage of the total Polish population, this ratio is greater than that of Dutch Christians involved in rescue, in a country where 75 per cent of the Jewish population was deported to their deaths, and where the reprisals for aiding Jews were not as heinous as in Poland.

Dear Friend,

Imagine for a moment that you or someone you really care about has been diagnosed with cancer. Everything the doctors have tried has failed to slow its course and that person's life is at stake.

What would you do if your family was the one in three that is affected by this dreaded disease?

Like us, you would do everything to help wipe out this horrible affliction.

Ten or twenty years ago, most people knew someone who had lost a battle with cancer.

Today most people know someone who has won a battle with cancer.

The difference is noticeable and Israel Cancer Research Fund has been one of the reasons for this great improvement. Since its inception ICRF has given 900 awards valued at $16.3 million to direct cancer research at 20 different institutions in Israel.

Israel is a natural laboratory for cancer research due to its unique concentration of diverse ethnic groups. This affords scientists an unparalleled opportunity to gather data on genetic and environmental factors contributing to cancer development.

Israel has the highest concentration of scientists and physicians in the free world, now including resettling Russian emigres. It is crucial that their research be supported or a priceless medical resource will be wasted.

Israeli scientists must submit their intended research to our non denominational board of 30 top American and Canadian oncologists (headed by Dr. Alan Bernstein at Mount Sinai). At the last review of over 250 applications, 181 were graded A+. Of this group, funds were available for only 106 and 75 had to be passed over! One of these researchers could have had the answer.

We are writing concerned and interested friends like you to consider a gift to Israel Cancer Research Fund.

If you have given to ICRF before, please increase your support if at all possible.

There are few dreams so universal as the desire to find a cure for cancer. Without you, it can't happen; with you, it can and it will!

CANCER WILL BE CURED!

We ask that you respond to this letter now by filling out the enclosed form and returning your tax deductible donation in the enclosed envelope. Please consider membership with a minimum annual donation of $100 (you may give more). Martin Dover, President
Israel Cancer Research Fund

Dr. H. Joseph Greenberg

P.S. Your donation of any amount will be gratefully received and carefully invested in hope. You and ICRF will make it happen!

Perspectives

Criticizing Israel from afar

Crossing the lines

During the years of the Likud government in the 1980s, the Peace Now and other progressive Jewish movements throughout the world were known for their vehement opposition to the policies of that government. In particular, they came out strongly against the Israeli invasion of Lebanon, not least because it resulted in the deaths of some 600 Israeli soldiers and finally brought about a wave of terrorism in Southern Lebanon which has not ceased until today.

By David Newman

The Peace Now leadership began a series of public protests and demonstrations against the Israeli government, especially during the visits of the single figure who was most strongly identified with the policies of the government of the day, defence minister Ariel Sharon.

The methods adopted by Peace Now at the time brought the wrath of their right-wing opponents down upon their heads. How, it was argued, could an organization which supported the State of Israel demonstrate and protest publicly against the policies of a democratically elected government? True, the Israeli populace was deeply divided over what was seen by many as being a mistaken war, but this debate was carried out in Israel, among the residents of the country who were directly affected by these policies. It was not, so the arguments went, the place of any Jewish or Zionist organization to "wash their dirty linen in public" by bringing the world's attention to the errors of the government. Peace Now was attacked for being a divisive element within the Diaspora and for attempting to delegitimize the government of the State of Israel in its relations with the international community.

Since the change in government in 1992 and the subsequent signing of the Oslo Accords between Israel and the PLO leadership, the boot would now appear to be on the other foot. We are treated to a concerted campaign on the part of the right-wing supporters of a Greater Israel to delegitimize the policies and actions of the government of Israel. The messages coming through the media, public speakers and a sophisticated network of electronic cyberspace are virtually unanimous in their condemnation of anything which occurs in Israel, often issues which bear no relation whatsoever to the peace process itself.

The criticism given by the religious right is a mirror image of the protest practised by the left wing. In response to the "women in black" who demonstrated for years against the policies of the Likud government, they created the "women in green." In response to the Bitzelem human rights organization, they have now formed the Bitzedek movement. If Peace Now used to bewail the deaths of so many young Israeli soldiers in the futile Lebanon war, the right wing are now able to play the callous numbers game and blame the Israeli government for the fatalities caused by the Islamic fundamentalist terrorist groups. Not only is this erroneous in its interpretation, but it is a crude use of the lives and deaths of Israeli citizens to score a few political points.

How well we would do to echo the sentiments of the courageous parents of the young American girl who was murdered by the Islamic terrorists. They refused to let her funeral be turned into a demonstration of anti-government rhetoric by the local right-wing adherents, preferring instead to restate their faith in the policies of a democratically elected government, regardless of whether those particular policies were compatible with their own personal views concerning the current political situation.

Go to many of the Orthodox synagogues in North America and try and hear something good or positive about Israel, its economic development and growth, its continued absorbtion of immigrants, the massive infrastructural and housing construction which is going on under the present government, and you would feel that you have entered the wrong building. The notice boards are full of selective information on everything negative in Israel, the divrei torah are full of venom for the Israeli government and the list of speakers and their topics for the coming month are no more than a concerted attempt at delegitimizing the government of the State of Israel. The government is "anti-Jewish" (as though the Likud party and its leaders, with the single and notable exception of Menachem Begin, were any closer to religious and traditional values than the Labor party); it lacks Zionist ideals and values (of course, they know the true meaning of Zionism better than those who fought for the establishment and security of the State of Israel); and it "discriminates" against Jewish residents of the West Bank (they now are subject to the same criteria and conditions as every other committed settler in the Galilee and Negev, instead of continuing to receive preferential treatment in the form of cheap land and tax benefits).

Crude use of the deaths of citizens

When openly challenged with this example of disloyalty to Israel, the right-wing opponents of the peace process have two answers.

The first is that we would never have dared to criticise the Israeli government in the past, but Peace Now led the way by breaking the concensus by which Diaspora Jewry were traditionally unanimous in their support for the Israeli government. If they could do it, so can we — and we, by the way, do it much more successfully.

The second answer is a self-righteous one. We criticize the Israeli government out of "our love for Israel and Zionism." After all, "we are true patriots, the left wing are traitors." We desire the welfare and safety of Israeli citizens and we are worried that the policies of the Israeli government will not bring this about. After all, we are the "flagbearers of pioneering Zionism today — the rest of the country no longer shares these same values."

As one proponent of the Greater Israel cause said, "only we [the religious right] know the meaning of the phrase 'to be a free people,' when we sing Hatikvah. The rest of the country have forgotten its meaning."

Not only is this argument erroneous, it is self-righteous in the extreme. The 70 per cent of the Israeli populace who are secular, who build industries, who serve in the army, who live in the Galil, the Negev (the true peripheries of the country), North Tel Aviv and Herzliyah, continue to be the pil-

Proposed guidelines

Do Jews living in the Diaspora have the moral right to participate in decisions made by the state of Israel? To be bothered at all with this familiar yet pertinent question is to sense a degree of responsibility as a member of the Jewish people, to feel bound by an implicit social contract whose terms may not always be clear.

By Hillel Neuer

Two central principles may be said to stand opposed to one another. The first argues that the Jewish people are one, that Israel is a Jewish state and the homeland for the Jewish nation; and, accordingly, that all Jews wherever they may reside can participate in navigating Israel's future. Indeed, one could go further and contend that such participation may be regarded as a welcome and healthy sign of Jewish commitment, perhaps even a duty.

The second key principle asserts that those who do not stand to suffer the effects of decisions should not be involved in making them. The Jew in Israel, if a decision is bad, stands to be hit with stones, Scuds or Katyushas. The Jew residing in Willowdale or Westmount knows nothing of such risks. As Montreal's Rabbi Reuben Poupko has said of the immense sacrifices made by Jews in Israel, we in the Diaspora but stand in their shadow. In this sense, telling our Israeli cousins what to do is the zenith of chutzpah.

It is somewhat ironic, then, that recent history has as often as not witnessed Israelis stressing the first principle and Diaspora Jews the second. The lesson is that we in the Diaspora should not necessarily look to Israelis — many of whom may be acting out of partisan interests — to solve our moral dilemma. We ourselves must determine when we are acting as legitimately-concerned Jews, and when as arrogant armchair-generals.

During the Likud era, when media coverage and international opinion seemed to conspire in portraying Israel as the villain in Lebanon or the territories, certain Jews in the Diaspora — from Jewish organizations or from the media — felt compelled to express their dissent with Israeli policy and were actively encouraged by left-wingers from Israel. Yet to the right in both Israel and especially America, such statements were condemned as immoral, anti-Israel, sometimes even as anti-Semitic.

Suddenly, in 1995, the shoe is on the other foot. Elements of America's right are now socking it to the Israeli government, literally and figuratively. And Israel's current opposition — yesterday's government — gives its blessing to the dissent.

Whereas Likudniks once rightly decried Peace Now Americans for urging Bush and Baker to strong-arm Israel, they now collaborate with groups like the Zionist Organization of America in lobbying Washington to block Israeli policies regarding withdrawal from the Golan or aid to the PLO.

To his credit, Norman Podhoretz, intellectual father of the American Jewish right and outgoing editor of Commentary, recognized in an April 1993 essay the apparent hypocrisy of criticizing the Rabin government when he and others had long denounced Jewish critics of Israel.

But, unlike the left, Podhoretz argued, the right's criticism did not weaken but rather strengthened Israel's bargaining position. It never accused Israel of being immoral, and thus could not be considered as "joining the jackals." Moreover, it would neither effect a weakening of U.S. support for Israel nor provide cover for anti-Semites. Therefore, despite some "moral qualms," Podhoretz felt he could with a clear conscience and without acting inconsistently tell the democratically elected government of Israel they were messing up.

For many, though, all of this amounted to no more than a poor justification for declaring that, on Israel, "only the right has the right to write." And no matter how appealing the rationalizations, such a proposition is patently unacceptable.

For one thing, following Israel's signing of the Oslo accord, the bargaining-booster arguments no longer applies — that is, one cannot really claim to be strengthening positions already conceded.

Second, Podhoretz et al. have been proven wrong because those on the right now also hurl the immorality accusation — albeit of their own variety — against the Israeli government, referring either to the surrender of parts of the Land of Israel or to shaking hands with the likes of PLO leader Yasser Arafat.

Finally, the right's logic fails where it suggests rightist critics need not worry their remarks will lend comfort to Israel's enemies. Yes, Amos Oz and others on the left engaged in the most spurious of politics when they smeared the Likud as somehow similar to Hamas. But if one adheres to the doctrine that any Jew advocating territorial or other concessions is somehow tainted because this would please the enemies of Israel, it must also be true that calling for an end to the peace process is equally illegitimate, as this would thrill Muslim militants.

'Only the Right has the right'

Now it is entirely understandable that many Jews devoted to Israel will feel their patience pushed to the limit when certain Israeli ministers provocatively attack established principles of faith in Zionism or Judaism.

Still, they would prove themselves most honorable by respecting some version of the following guidelines: no Rabin-bashing outside a Jewish forum; no appeal to foreign governments as a means of circumventing Jewish or Israeli democratic institutions; no lecturing Israelis on how to be better Zionists without absorbing a good dose of humility beforehand.

This ethic would be most relevant concerning Jewish organizations, and should include most security-related issues. Applying this to journalists, however, would probably be an exercise in futility.

Yet to the extent that some pundits want to consider themselves Jewishly-responsible, they might, for example, refrain from urging the U.S. government to frustrate Jerusalem's plans. (The disingenuous argument that such advocacy is done either "as Americans" or "solely out of concern for U.S. interests" is fooling nobody.)

As explosive issues such as Hebron and Jerusalem wait their turn on the agenda, the Diaspora must do its part to ensure the Jewish debate be marked by basic civility and mutual respect.

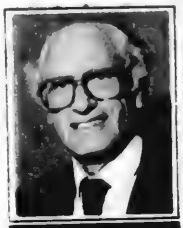
Berlin synagogue is dedicated

A synagogue in Berlin recently captured the attention of the news media both in Germany and beyond. In 1866, 129 years ago (five years before the founding of a unified German Reich), a house of worship, dubbed "the New Synagogue," was dedicated and thereby marked the official recognition that Jews were a legitimate part of the city's population. Up till then, while synagogue buildings were allowed, they could be no taller than the two floors of ordinary dwellings and were usually built away from public view behind tall gates and courtyards, so that one could walk through the streets without knowing that a synagogue was housed anywhere in the neighborhood.



By Rabbi Gabriel P...

But in 1866, the New Synagogue was permitted to have public exposure and its architects did everything to take advantage of the permission. The edifice became a landmark in Berlin; a golden cupola crowned its majestic structure and amidst all the many synagogues of Berlin it remained the most visible and important. Appropriately, Rabbi Leo Baeck preached there.

This very symbol of pride in our religion should have been the first victim of Kristallnacht, on November 9-10, 1938, when 1,100 houses of worship were put to the torch in Germany. The New Synagogue was a prime target of the Nazis; yet the head of the local police office summoned the fire department and insisted that the synagogue, which was already burning, be saved and the fire be extinguished. This courageous act saved the synagogue from the Nazis, but it could not save it after war had broken out and the Allies began to bomb the German capital. In 1943, the synagogue was destroyed, its cupola disappeared along with its many rooms and halls, its library and its 3,200 seats that had so often been filled to the last place.

After the war, when the Communists ruled the eastern part of the city, hardly any Jews came back to live under a repressive anti-religious regime. Still, the authorities wanted to show that anti-Semitism was no longer the agenda of their country; so they began the restoration. But only after the city was unified once again did the work progress seriously.

The rededication of the synagogue took place a few weeks ago, in the presence of German Chancellor Helmut Kohl and Israeli representatives, as well as former Berlin Jews who had been invited from all over the world. I could not attend, but I had seen the restoration not long before. The facade is as it has always been, with the golden cupola rising proudly into the sky. The building stands at the very centre of the city and dominates the skyline. The morning and evening sun reflecting on its huge dome inevitably draws the eye.

But the synagogue is not really a synagogue; it is primarily a facade and a symbol. Only a few offices and meeting rooms and the Centrum Judaicam are found behind it. Yet the symbol is important because of the structure's dominance. Over the gates are inscribed the words of Isaiah: "Let a righteous nation enter, a nation that keeps the faith."

For the time being, so the news releases indicate, the synagogue will not be completed but will remain a partial ruin, in order to symbolize the gaping wound that was left when Berlin Jewry was destroyed. No one can tell when this wound will heal, if ever.

Power of the tongue

In Judaism, the tongue is mightier than the sword. God created the world through words. The mystics taught that worlds can be created by our words.

Joan M. Gerber

Words can also destroy. Even to speak words that bring a blush to the cheek of a person is considered by the rabbis as equivalent to murder.

So it is no surprise that Jews are very careful to examine the words of their friends as well as those of their enemies.

And we have endured a barrage of words from those for whom hatred of others is an all-consuming passion.

Canada's home-grown haters have had not only their day in court but millions of words about and by them, with little sign that they will be silent. But maybe that doesn't count, since they have not raised a hand against us. They have, however, begun to dehumanize us by naming us as the enemy, as the "other," the one who is not quite human — a technique has allowed others to kill us.

The ultra-right shares our respect for words. Hatred and slander of Israel and Jews are taken very seriously by both groups. Right-wing radio is a perfect example. Tune in to any one of the talk shows that open air time to hatred, and we hear the power that words have to wound our feelings.

Until Oklahoma City, that seemed to be all they hurt. Oh, here were some unpleasant exceptions — shoot-outs with a few gun-toting extremists. And the murder of Alan Berg — but maybe that didn't count either.

Now I think it counts.

In 1864, when a mode of governance was crafted for Canada, its creators looked south to bruised Civil War America and decided they didn't like what they saw; Canada would avoid the pitfalls of the wrong balance between state and federal authority. (I leave it to the reader to decide whether Canada has been successful in this regard.) Canada has once again the opportunity now to do things differently from its American cousin.

Let me be clear. I do not propose gag laws, thought police or muzzling of opinion in the free exchange of ideas. I do suggest this:

- That we no longer accept in silence the hatred of a newspaper columnist, talk-show host or guest or local clone of the white supremacist movement. Jews in Canada have many avenues of protest. Let's use them all. To leave these words unchallenged is to give them validity in the minds of some, and lend power to their speakers.
- That we take back the airwaves and the printed word, rather than allowing them to be manipulated by the assassins of truth.
- That we no longer pander to right-wing Christian groups who appear to support Israel. That we take back our self-respect and pride. We have friends who respect Judaism; we do not need those who, in the end, despise it and anticipate its disappearance.
- That we continue to use the legal remedies that, poor as they are, protect us against words. We do not have to let speech that undermines our freedom go unchallenged.
- That, if the present remedies are insufficient, we press for legal ones that are more powerful. The courts are there for our protection. Once we give up on them, we run the risk of being in the same place as the United States, where courts are held in contempt, where the legitimacy of the government to protect the innocent is under attack from both the governing themselves and those who would destroy our government.

The merits of revisiting the past

Montreal lawyer Julius Grey, speaking to a small group of students at a community college during a CEGEP Holcaust Symposium, precipitated a storm of controversy when he criticized The March of the Living and suggested that Israeli and other Jewish leaders were exploiting the Holocaust and fear of anti-Semitism to keep Jews in the fold.

By Arnold Ages

Commemorating the victims of the Holocaust and visiting the death camps are not exploitation. Yosef Yerushalmi points out in his book Zakhor that in times past, Jews memorialized martyrs by eulogizing them in the prayer liturgy and in various hymns. Thus the Crusades (the 1,000th anniversary of which will be commemorated later this year) gave birth to a library of Hebrew religious poetry recording the Jewish disasters which flowed from the murderous path taken by the Crusaders in their quest to rid the Holy Land of the "infidels."

Our generation, still reeling from the numbing effects of the greatest catastrophe to befall Judaism in all its millenia of history, is struggling to find the proper medium through which to express the inexpressible sense of tragedy and loss. Our composers, poets, writers and liturgy specialists have not yet found the appropriate idiom — as our medieval sages did — to fix forever in the historical consciousness of the Jewish people the pangs of despair and loss which hover over the spectre of the Holocaust.

Half a century after that event the Jewish community is trying, however imperfectly, through the construction of museums, monuments, educational facilities and visits to Auschwitz and other death camp sites, to reach out for a language that will communicate to the next generation what a previous one experienced. George Steiner put it succinctly when he wrote that to have been born a Jew in the 1930s in Europe "was to receive a sentence of death." Each generation has its own way of recording the impact of that kind of statement.

Viewpoint representative of tiny constituency

The critical viewpoint expressed by the Montreal lawyer is representative of a tiny constituency in the Jewish community and it is a view, ironically, which comes at a time when others, especially young Germans are beginning to grasp for the first time the magnitude of the crime committed against Jews during the Holocaust. Björn Krondorfer, a German specialist in religious studies, has recently completed a lengthy study of the "third generation," the grandchildren of those Germans who participated in World War II.

Krondorfer notes that the first generation, for reasons that were obvious, cast a pall of silence over its role during the Third Reich. The second generation grew up during Germany's wirtschaftswunder — the economic miracle which propelled the country to prosperity from the 1960s to the 1990s. This generation was deprived, with rare exception, of information about the Holocaust.

Now the third generation of German youth is beginning, in an unprecedented way, to question grandparents and parents about gaps in the collective memory of the German people. This generation agrees with Lawrence Langer's characterization that "the Holocaust theatens to be a permanent hole in the ozone layer of history."

One of the ways the third generation has begun groping with their unremembered past is through travel to concentration camp sites and meetings with Jewish groups in Europe, the United States and Israel. Dialogues between German and Jewish youth have been remarkably frank and the task of reconciliation, a delicate exercise, has been nurtured through these talks. Encounters with knowledgeable Jewish students in those areas have helped fill out some of the information gaps experienced by the German students, but what has often shaken the third generation is the utter normalcy of their Jewish contacts.

Fifty years after the liberation of the concentration camps, a story which has been retold many times in the past two decades is now beginning to penetrate the consciousness of the third generation of Germans. Jews have the obligation to work with this generation so that the horrors of the Holocaust never recur.

The saga of Yosef Burg

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

"I did not parachute into politics," mused Josef Burg. "I grew into it."

In this succinct phrase, Burg — one of the paramount figures of the religious Zionist movement — aptly describes a career that few politicians will ever match.

Now 86, Burg was born in Dresden, the scion of an East Galicianer who immigrated to Germany in 1902. Armed with a University of Leipzig doctorate in philosophy, Burg plunged into Zionist politics, becoming a member of the Zionist Action Committee of the World Zionist Organization.

In 1938, the year of Kristallnacht, Burg graduated from the Berlin Rabbinic Seminary as an ordained rabbi. He left Germany in 1939, bound for Palestine. In succession, he was a research fellow at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem and a teacher at the Herzlia gymnasium in Tel Aviv. With the war over, he helped Jewish refugees, working out of an office in Paris.

Elected to the first Knesset in 1949 as a representative of the National Religious Party (NRP), Burg was named deputy speaker of the house in the same year. When he relinquished the post in 1951, he joined the cabinet, serving uninterruptedly until 1986. He held portfolios in health, posts, welfare, interior, police and religious affairs.

In addition, from 1970, Burg headed the NRP list in the Knesset. And from 1979 to 1982, he was chair of the cabinet committee monitoring Palestinian autonomy negotiations. He gave up his Knesset seat in 1988. "I decided, after 40 years, that it was time to hand over the helm to younger people."

A restless individual, Burg was not content to fade away.

Apart from being president of the World Mizrachi Movement, Burg is chair of Yad Vashem's international committee. He also sits on the board of Bar-Ilan University and the Leo Baeck Institute and broadcasts weekly lectures on the Bible on Israeli radio.

Reflecting on his present status, Burg observed: "Now I'm an 'elder statesman,' and I feel quite good in this role. A lot of things occupy me."

Burg, whose son Avraham was recently elected chair of the Jewish Agency, is a rotund, bright-eyed man given to peppering his fairly fluent English with Yiddish words and phrases. Though not physically robust, he is mentally alert.

"According to my years, I am not in bad health," he said the other afternoon in an interview in Toronto. "But I'm at an age where every day is a present from God."

Looking back, Burg believes the highlights of his political career were directing the autonomy talks, meeting with a pantheon of U.S. presidents, developing a Postal Bank, improving social services, consolidating religious education and heightening awareness of ecology.

The autonomy negotiations, an outgrowth of the 1978 Camp David Accord, ultimately broke down. But Burg is convinced they were useful because they fostered dialogue between Israel and Egypt.

"Golda Meir used to say, 'If the Arabs are not ready to talk with us about peace, how can we believe they'll be ready to live with us in peace.' "

Burg glosses over his setbacks, but voices regret that the NRP did not join the Labor government, headed by Yitzhak Rabin, in July 1992. "Without the participation of the NRP, a constructive Zionist element is missing from the equation. It's bad for the state. Our presence in the government could have diminished the process of giving up certain territories in Eretz Yisrael."

Burg is critical of Prime Minister Rabin's strategy in the peace talks. "The government gave up too much too soon. There has to be a certain correlation between what you give and what you receive. At the moment, the balance is loaded in favor of the Arabs." In his view, the Oslo peace process is "nisht a glick."

Unlike the majority of right-wing Israeli politicians, Burg has no theoretical objection to PLO involvement in the negotiations. "In 1980, I said publicly I would be prepared to have talks with the PLO under two conditions: If it renounced its national covenant [which calls for Israel's destruction], and if two years went by without terrorism and I was convinced that [Yasser] Arafat could deliver the goods. These conditions are not fulfilled until today."

Convinced that the PLO is not fully in compliance with the 1993 Declaration of Principles, Burg believes the government should draw up a list of "what was agreed and what was implemented."

Perhaps then, he suggested, the talks with the Palestinians will be reconstituted on a new basis. But is there an alternative to the Oslo process? "There is no clear answer at this moment because of too many cooks in the kitchen."

Turning to a related topic, he expressed confidence that a national unity government would better serve Israel's interests at the negotiating table.

Although Burg accepts "the need for small [territorial] corrections" as part of an overall settlement with the Arabs, he steadfastly feels that the Jewish settlements across the Green Line should retain their "rights and security under Israeli rulership."

He opposes the annexation of the West Bank, but is doubtful that a Palestinian state would be in Israel's interests. A Swiss canton system may be the solution, he noted.

Israeli control over Jerusalem is non-negotiable. "Jerusalem was never the capital of an Arab state. Never. I told President [Jimmy] Carter that the word 'Yerushalayim' appears in our Bible several hundred times, and not once in the Koran."

The Golan Heights, he added, should remain in Israel's hands. Suggestions that it may be traded for peace with Syria are "unwise and dangerous."

The subject animates him. "There cannot be any talk of giving up the Golan. This is territory that protects all of Israel." Besides, he said, "I have no reason to trust [Hafez] al-Assad," the president of Syria.

As the longest-serving cabinet minister in Israel's history, Burg is well qualified to comment on related political issues.

•He opposed Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon, being of the opinion that it could turn into a quagmire. Massive shelling and bombing of PLO bases would have been sufficient, he said.

•Menachem Begin was an "excellent" prime minister in his "first years." Burg declined to elaborate.

•He rejected Begin's offer of Israel's presidency because he wanted to devote all his efforts to the "national religious idea."

•Unlike Begin, he supported the idea that Israel should establish diplomatic relations with Germany 30 years ago. As he put it: "There is no Europe without Germany and no world without Europe."

Burg, who has returned to Germany several times since the war, went back to Dresden — his hometown — in the late 1980s and found that his old home had been destroyed by Allied bombing raids in February 1945.

He has fairly positive memories of pre-Nazi, Weimar Germany. "I accept what Martin Buber said: In all our wanderings, there was never so much in common as between Jewish and German culture. But as a national religious Jew, I knew the good times couldn't continue to eternity."

Burg's father, Abraham — a Mizrachi activist who died in 1937 — was naively convinced that Hitler wouldn't make good on his anti-Jewish rantings. Burg wasn't so sure, and in the aftermath of Kristallnacht, he concluded that German Jewry had no future.

Nevertheless, Burg stayed on longer than he wished, partly because of his desire to be with his mother, and partly because of his involvement with Youth Aliyah in spiriting out Jews from Germany.

Burg's mother would not or could not leave Germany in 1939 when he did, and she eventually perished in the Theresienstadt concentration camp. The Holocaust also claimed his grandmother, an uncle and a cousin.

Despite the personal losses he suffered, Burg believes that German-Jewish reconciliation is unavoidable. "You are not allowed to forget," he said, referring to the Holocaust. "But you are commanded to build bridges to the future."

Viva Mexico

The Jewish community in Mexico as we know it today was formed in the 1920s and 1930s, when young, footloose immigrants from Eastern Europe and the Middle East settled there.

These adventurers found work, married, raised families and established synagogues and institutions, laying the foundation of Mexico's modern Jewish community.

Jews had previously lived in Mexico, but in small numbers, and, prior to Mexican independence, as Marranos.

The newcomers were not necessarily drawn to Mexico per se. Many would have preferred the United States, Canada or Australia, but xenophobic immigration restrictions and other obstacles kept them out. I learned from watching A Kiss To This Land, Daniel Goldberg's interesting documentary at the recent Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

Goldberg lets the immigrants, now old-timers, explain why they left their countries of origin. Boiled down to its bare essentials, they chose Mexico because they were in search of a better life. At home, opportunities were limited by economic underdevelopment and by the scourge of anti-Semitism. And since Mexico had liberal immigration laws, Jews regarded it as a hospitable haven.

The immigrants arrived by ship, disembarking in the steamy port of Veracruz. They had to contend with seasickness and other hazards. At a stopover in Cuba, one man took ill and was rushed to hospital after devouring two whole pineapples. Once on shore, they had to be vigilant. One newcomer was robbed. Fortunately, he had already purchased his train ticket to Mexico City, his final destination.

Possessing no trades or professions, they toiled as peddlars and salesmen, often moving around the country. One man, a Syrian from Aleppo, worked in all 32 Mexican states before opening a shop in Mexico City. Another, a Socialist, discovered he couldn't support his family as a simple worker and, somewhat apologetically, turned to business.

Marriage, we're told, was a decisive and stabilizing factor in their lives. Once they had children, they could claim Mexican citizenship.

Anti-Semitism is hardly an issue in the film, though hoary myths about Jews die hard. One merchant, for example, allowed several Mexican women to feel his head to assure them he had no horns!

The Holocaust destroyed the bridge to their past, at least in the case of the Polish, Russian and Ukrainian Jews. The parents, relatives and friends they had left behind were dead.

The end of World War II ushered in a new era. The "greeners" prospered, while their offspring went to university and expanded their horizons. Of course, not everyone met with success. In frustration, a Yiddish actor abandoned acting. A pensioner lost his savings after the devaluation of the peso. But on balance, the newcomers improved their lives in Mexico.

By RABBI MICHAEL WOLFF

While visiting a patient at a long-term care hospital unit recently, I gave the man a milk bar. The patient might not have understood the religious significance of the gift but it is there. To fulfil the mitzvah of bikur cholim (visiting the sick), one must make the person feel better. If a bar of chocolate (with the nurse's permission of course) is better than a conversation with the rabbi, then the mitzvah of caring is there.

In April, I went to the brit milah of my nephew. My brother said that even though he is not observant and does not understand the significance of the ritual of circumcision, nevertheless his son would have a proper brit. The action of showing one's faith, one's identity was most important. The action of brit milah was fulfilled.

At the Canadian Jewish Congress plenary, Edgar Bronfman, the president of the World Jewish Congress, said he is now attending a regular class in Talmud. Bronfman is studying the tractate of Baba Metzia which, in part, delineates Jewish law as regards to returning or claiming lost objects. Bronfman expressed his fascination with the concept of how Torah law can permeate every physical aspect of life, even business affairs. He said he takes his class seriously.

Whether one performs an act of kindness or a life cycle ritual, or one simply sits and learns Torah regularly, the expression of one's Jewishness is there, but the measurement of the expression is in the action. One must do a clear, physically verifiable, deed. The action must be seen. One cannot promise the chocolate and not give it, nor say that one will study and not sit down, book in hand. Judaism is not based on intention but on action, doing.

Judaism has a concept of making a Brachah on an action. Jewish law requires us to move directly from blessing into fulfilling. When one makes a blessing on an action like lighting candles or eating bread or studying Torah, one must move immediately to the action of lighting, eating or learning. Failure to do so is called a waste of a Brachah. It is considered taking G-d's name in vain.

Whatever we do, we should be conscious that it is our actions which have a Jewish significance. The action can be small. The action can be special, a once in a lifetime event. The action can be intellectual. Whatever it is, when we do the action we proclaim our Jewishness. The key to one's identification as a Jew is to remember to do things which are Jewish. Jewish continuity is based not on intent but on action.

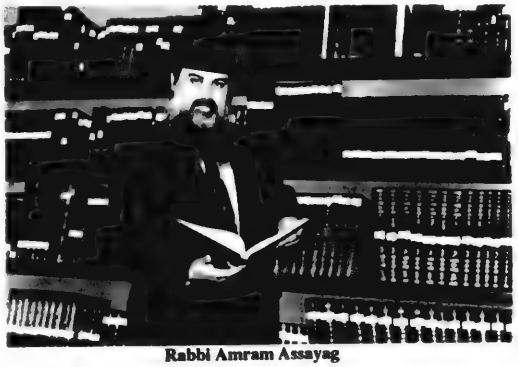
Beth Sepharad a centre for Sephardi culture

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter



Rabbi Amram Assayag

TORONTO — Works by the great Sephardi scholars past and present are a major part of a new library opened recently at Beth Sepharad.

Beth Sepharad is a synagogue and centre for Sephardi life in the Main Exchange Plaza at Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue in Thornhill.

The library is associated with Medrash Torah Vehayim, the Sephardic Institute of Torah Study.

Rabbi Amram Assayag, spiritual leader of Petah Tikvah congregation, is the enthusiastic creator, organizer and developer of the library.

He told The CJN he has built the collection with the help of the Sephardic Library in Jerusalem, which has helped him find rare works by Sephardi masters.

Some, he said, were only printed once and might only be found in homes of an author's relatives.

Rabbi Assayag said he wants to include works on Torah subjects from every Sephardi community, including Morocco, Algiers, Turkey, Greece, Gibraltar and the Middle East, as well as less well known communities in England, Amsterdam and the former Yugoslavia.

One book, V'yomer Itzhak, is by Itzhak Ben Walid, a Tangiers rabbi of 130 years ago. The first time it was reprinted was 15 years ago, Rabbi Assayag said.

Another was published 41 years ago but never reprinted. While the rabbi is trying to complete sets of all the books, he sometimes has to make up complete sets from different editions.

One of his favorites is by Rabbi Massas, chief rabbi of Algiers, Morocco and finally Haifa. This unique book on the laws of divorce, which is used extensively by rabbinic courts dealing with the subject, is reprinted in Rabbi Massas' own handwriting.

"Many are rare books that you won't find anywhere else," Rabbi Assayag said.

The library also includes modern and widely known Torah works. "People sometimes forget that universally accepted halachic scholars like Rambam (Maimonides) were Sephardim," he pointed out.

Besides adding to the collection ("I have a long list that I am looking for"), he plans to make a catalogue of the collection, which will include a biography of the authors.

For more information, call the Medrash Information Line, 416-636-2313.

Jewish Life

The Great Beginning

By MICHAEL LEBOVIC

Every day we hear about peace, with a capital P. There is Pax Americana, land for peace, peace in our time. There are peace talks, peace conferences, the peace process, peace negotiations and my favorite, the peace summit. That's where they all take climbing gear.

GUEST VOICES

Peace is such a great little word, so satisfyingly altruistic. No wonder it's always been so popular. I mean, where would the '60s have been without it? It molded an entire generation. Can you imagine, "All we are saying is give business or government or investment a chance." I don't think so. Would Bob Dylan have made it without it? Not with that voice.

Peace is a word for all ages, and the '90s are as good an age as any.

As we all know, the media is full of it, the word peace, I mean. Usually it's found in a story about, well, war. Or as it's now called, an episode, an occurrence, a development. Someone is usually shooting or bombing the heck out of some other group, preferably a neighboring minority or nation. This way they can kill and maim without all that G-d awful travelling and be back home in time for supper. A quick look at the TV to catch themselves on the news and then straight to bed so they can wake refreshed for the next day's maiming.

Can you fill us in on what's happening, the TV interviewers ask.

"Well, I don't want to boast, but we're kicking the $&@& out of them, the reason being our desire for peace, of course. And, hey! I had first dibs on that Mercedes! Uh, would you mind holding this ammo belt. BLAM! Got him! Where were we? Oh yeah, peace. As you can see we live for it. It's people, that's what's important"

But you've just spent the last four hours shooting at people?

"Yeah, well I didn't mean those people. Besides, as soon as we're finished we're gonna build hospitals, schools, nurseries and supermarkets. You know, when the smoke clears, you can see all the way to where the city used to be. Kinda peaceful, ain't it?"

Now I would humbly submit this is not the peace we all long for. It's not even the kind of universal peace and love that beauty pageant contestants everywhere promise to bring us — peace through excellence in fashion and good dentistry.

What we're really asking for is peace between individuals, between plain, unarmed, civilized, cellular phone-packing, carpooling folk. Wouldn't that be something? We could call it The Great Beginning. It sounds so noble, I can actually feel my eyes getting misty.

What, you may ask, got a laidback type like me onto this. Well I'll tell you. I was in the supermarket the other day (attention all chain stores, your name here for just $250) and I ran into this couple I know rather casually. Truth be known, I had no desire to intensify our "relationship." I was bearing down on them cart in hand, greeting in throat, then they just gave me the chin. You know what I mean, the bop of the head that says, "Sorry, we only have nods for you.".

I was miffed. Of all the insults, to be snubbed by people I didn't even want to talk to! I'd never talk to them again. I was so furious I forgot to fill up on my snackpacks.

By the time I got into my car I had really worked myself up. I felt wounded; that's the last time I would ever stick my neck out to be nice.

When I sat down to read the paper that evening it struck me how we all want world peace, but not in my backyard, with my neighbors. We don't want to get involved. That's what G-d and the United Nations, lehavdil, are there for.

Nu, how are we going to build this better world we're always talking about when we're afraid to put ourselves out even on the most elementary level? I suspect that while I'm agonizing over why G-d doesn't do more for peace, he's probably wondering the same about me.

Limits of Diaspora criticism

lars around which Isreli society is developing and growing. They may not share the same religious values that I or the religious right have, but in the past we sought ways to build and create together, not to exclude and delegitimize the very groups who founded the State, and from which we all, right wing and left, religious and secular continue to benefit and be proud of.

For its part, the left wing and the supporters of the peace process seem to have lost their voices. They seem unable to respond. Is it because there really is no response? Or perhaps, as is often the case, they sit back with the false security of knowing that, for the present, the government represents their views rather than those of the opposition. If so, it is a mistaken assumption. The Diaspora Jewish community requires assurance. It does need convincing of the importance of continuing with a peace process which is so fraught with obstacles and which so far has been associated with increasing fundamentalism and terror. True, the Israeli government will go ahead with its policies with or without the support of the Diaspora (and this is true of any Israeli government, right or left), but it can ill afford to create a fragmentation to a degree which will make it difficult to heal in the future. Between them, the Israeli government's failure to answer the call of assurance, and the right-wing's continual criticism and sniping at just about anything which happens in Israel, they are succeeding in causing a major rift between Israel and the Diaspora, and within the Diaspora community itself.

Is it true that the right wing are more committed to Israel? That they feel closer to daily events there, that they send more of their children to study, and even live, in Israel? If that is the case, then it is time for other groups to demonstrate their equal commitment to, and love for, Israel. It is time to get up and stop being part of a silent majority/minority. But at the same time, the tone of the debate in the Diaspora needs to be lowered, with the more vociferous and vehement part of the debate being left for the citizens of Israel themselves. It is time to return to supporting the basic existence of the State of Israel.

Students greet olim

LOD, Israel — Two busloads of Canadian university students greeted a planeload of new immigrants at Ben Gurion Airport last week.

For the students, it was the end of a United Israel Appeal (UIA)-sponsored mission, Anguish to Hope, that took the Canadians to the Czech Republic, Poland, Jordan and Israel.

For the 154 new immigrants from Tashkent, Bukhara, Samarkand and other eastern republics of the former Soviet Union, it was the start of new lives in Israel. Most will go to the homes of relatives and friends who preceded them here, to begin the "direct absorption" process. The others will be brought to Absorption Centres.

During the mission, the students, from 25 Canadian colleges and universities, had a first-hand opportunity to examine the current status of the peace process.

In addition to greeting the country's newest immigrants, the students visited Canada Centre, a landmark recreational facility in Metulla on Israel's northern frontier, and the Canadian Project Renewal communities of Eilat and Beersheva.

Durham shul marks first year

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Reform B'nai Shalom V'Tikvah congregation of Durham Region is one year old this week, and birthday celebrations will take place in the United church that will likely house future services.

The 40-family congregation serves the bedroom communities of Ajax, Whitby and Pickering.

Most of the membership is made up of young families tired of the trek into Toronto for religious life, said congregation president and 11-year Ajax resident Harley Saltzman.

"The comment I'm constantly getting is 'I never knew there was something [Jewish] out there,' " Saltzman said.

The shul runs a school for 33 students between kindergarten and bar/bat mitzvah age, offers monthly Shabbat services with a visiting rabbi, and High Holiday services.

The synagogue hopes its programs and services, which until now have been held in various public institutions, will in future be held at St. Paul's United Church.

"We're the church with the open arms," said Karen Smart, assistant to the minister, in explaining why the church decided to rent its facilities for the birthday celebrations and the coming High Holidays.

Growing together

"We're growing together, to see if we can work together."

The church, under Rev. Glenn Jackson, also rents space to a Coptic Church for weekly services.

Sharon Ventura, the synagogue's social chair, said the 270-seat sanctuary is "very conducive" to services and nearly empty of Christian symbols. The sole crucifix will be covered with a backdrop during shul services, at the church's suggestion.

Dispute with Citizen settled

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Ottawa Jewish Community Council has settled a dispute with the Ottawa Citizen over the paper's suggestion that the local Jewish community had The Merchant of Venice dropped from high-school courses.

The newspaper has agreed to print a correction to a controversial May 1994 op-ed piece and to meet with community leaders about newspaper items local Jews have found biased or offensive. In turn, the council dropped its complaint with the Ontario Press Council.

The op-ed piece suggested the council had pressured the Ottawa Board of Education to drop Shakespeare's play from the curriculum entirely. The council says it asked the board that the play, which contains anti-Semitic stereotyping in the title character of Shylock, be removed from the Grade 9 curriculum and confined to older students.

Stan Urman, executive director of the council, said the resolution was part of an effort to improve a historically tense relationship with the Citizen.

Citizen editor Jim Travers said his meeting with Jewish community leaders was an eye opener and a classic case of people seeing things in different ways.

"I think we are beginning to see each other's point of view," he said. "Things that we hadn't seen as offensive had been offensive. There is a heightened sensitivity on the part of the Citizen and a recognition on their [the Jewish community's] part that we didn't intend to offend and didn't see how it would be taken."

The newspaper has invited a delegation from the Jewish community to lead a training session with reporters and editors to heighten their sensitivity to Jewish concerns.

Relations between the two sides have warmed enough that Bernard Dolansky, now the council's past-president, has been invited to sit as a guest on the Citizen's editorial board for several weeks this summer.

Christian-Jewish worship centre begun

WATERLOO — A groundbreaking ceremony was held here last week for the first Christian-Jewish worship centre in Canada.

The $1.34-million centre will be home to Westminster United Church and the Reform Temple Shalom when it is completed in early 1996.

The Cedars, as the centre is known, will include two sanctuaries, a nursery and a large community room. The 65-family Temple Shalom expects to use the smaller sanctuary, but the congregations will share worship space and other facilities as needed.

The twin-peaked roof was designed by Charles Simon. "It symbolizes two faiths in one shared space: one God, one idea," said Rick Chambers, co-chair of the design committee.

Representatives of the two congregations worked together for the past two years. "As far as we know, it's the first time in the world that a Jewish and Christian congregation have actually begun their relationship by designing a building together," said temple president Paul Kay.

The two congregations came together after a conversation between Waterloo neighbors Jim Robinson and Mark Pancer, past-president of Temple Shalom.

"When we realized that both congregations were looking for new, more permanent quarters, we said, 'Hey, maybe we can do something together!' " said Robinson, then chair of the church's building committee.

Westminster has been holding services at area schools after they grew out of the present building on the site. Temple Shalom has rented space from the Church of the Good Shepherd in downtown Kitchener since 1987.

Westminster United will own The Cedars. Temple Shalom will hold a five-year lease, with an option to purchase half interest.

Winnipeg Jewish athletes honored

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Tennis champion Hart Pollock and soccer goalie Colin Berenhaut were presented with the Max Nusgart Memorial Award for Manitoba Jewish Athlete of the Year at the YMHA Jewish Community Centre's annual sports dinner earlier this month.

Pollock, 18, is ranked No. 1 in the province in his age group. Berenhaut, 16, was a member of this year's junior national soccer team.

Among the other nominees were 15-year-old judo star Olia Berger, swimmer David Freedman, 17, 19-year-old synchronized swimmer Allison Katz, basketball player Guy Kedem and 18-year-old decathlon champion Geoff Rosenbaum.

The dinner drew about 800 people and featured former NFL all-pro defensive tackle Art Donovan. Proceeds from the dinner go towards Y programs.

Russian couples take 'giant step' under chupahs

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

VAUGHAN — It was mazel tov times 10 when 10 Russian couples, some married by civil law for over 20 years, were married simultaneously in a recent Jewish ceremony at Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue.

Over 1,000 people witnessed as the couples, denied a Jewish wedding ceremony in the former Soviet Union, stood outdoors under separate gold-trimmed chupahs, each attended by two rabbis.

Rabbi Yoseph Zaltzman, executive director of the Jewish Russian Community Centre and wedding host, said the couples taking part in the wedding ceremony "is a giant step towards Jewish tradition."

It is the fourth such wedding ceremony.

Russian Jewish couples under chupahs.

'Brings meaning to our marriage'

Vladimir and Ludmilla Estrin, who came from Latvia last year and have been married 26 years, said that although they considered themselves Jews in Latvia, "it was not until today that we are married under Jewish law. It means a lot to us."

Arkady and Diana Ulitsky said taking part in the ceremony "brings meaning and fulfillment to our marriage. Two of our three children, and our parents are here to witness this marriage and it brings happiness to us all. Coming together under the chupah brought Jewishness into our life together."

The wedding, coordinated by Arlene Weisbart, was also a fundraiser for the Jewish Russian Community Centre, which provides services and programs to the over 25,000 Russian Jews living in Toronto.

The other couples included Joseph and Luba Braverman, Michael and Sophia Dantzig, Alex and Kira Dukhovny, Boris and Violette Kartuz, Israel and Ida Landoi, Pavel and Berta Malinov, Pesach and Raisa Polevoy and Leois and Berta Schwarcer.

Shaare Zedek Foundation to honor Rabbi Monson

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Rabbi David Monson

TORONTO — Rabbi David Monson, who has been dubbed "the people's rabbi," will be recognized for his lifelong commitment to Jewish and non-Jewish causes in Canada and in Israel.

He will be honored at a Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation reception on June 27 at the Beth Sholom Synagogue, where he was spiritual leader for 38 years.

The funds raised will go to the David and Sue Monson Department of Laboratory Medicine, Shaare Zedek Medical Centre in Jerusalem.

Born in Ottawa, Rabbi Monson attended the Rabbinical College of Montreal where he was ordained at the age of 22. In 1939, he became spiritual leader of Toronto's Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

He married Sue Strashin in 1941 and the following year joined the Canadian Armed Forces as an overseas chaplain.

Irving Ungerman, who is co-chair of the tribute committee with immigration lawyer Mendel Green, says he met Rabbi Monson in a military hospital in England after receiving a gunshot wound while in the air force.

When Rabbi Monson started Beth Sholom, the first in Toronto to be founded as a Conservative synagogue, Ungerman was one of the original members; he still is an active member.

The City of North York and the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto have declared June 27 as Rabbi David Monson Day.

Rabbi Monson says his greatest joy is his family — his wife, daughter Judy and her husband Kenneth Waldman and their children, Beth, Monica and Stuart.

TV actor-director, Al Waxman will be the master of ceremonies at the tribute reception. For more information, call 416-781-3584.

CJN Rosh Hashanah Photo Contest

The CJN announces its Rosh Hashanah photo contest. We are asking our readers to submit photographs either of Israel or of any Jewish theme in their communities. They must be original photos taken by the reader.

Who can enter:
Anyone can enter except CJN employees or members of their family.

How to enter:
A maximum of three photos per entrant may be submitted. Please place your name, address and phone number on the back of each photo. We can only return the photos if you provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. We cannot be responsible however for any photos lost in the mail.

You may mail or deliver your photos to:
CJN Rosh Hashanah Contest, The Canadian Jewish News, 10 Gateway Blvd., Suite 420, Don Mills, Ontario, M3C 3A1.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on August 18, 1995.

Prizes:
The judges will choose the three photographs which, in their opinion, are most evocative.

The winning submissions will be published in The CJN Rosh Hashanah issue. In addition, each of the winners will receive a cheque for $100.

We will undoubtedly receive many worthy submissions. But only three will be selected as the winners. We will also select other photographs for publication as honorable mentions. The decisions of the judges will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and the quality of submissions received.

How the winners will be notified:
Winning entrants will be notified by telephone before the start of the Shabbat on Friday, August 25.

When the prizes will be awarded:
The winning photos will be published in The CJN of Sept. 21.

We look forward to receiving your submissions. May the camera's eye capture the stirrings of your heart. Good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Le Parc installs permanent kosher kitchen, welcomes Beverly Hills Caterers

Le Parc. A name so synonymous with elegance and distinction that it's become an icon in the catering industry.

Beverly Hills Caterers. A name at the forefront of creative, innovative kosher cuisine in Toronto.

And if ever the twain shall meet . . .

They have. Culminating a fruitful association that has seen Beverly Hills cater many fabulous kosher functions at Le Parc, the two parties have decided to officialize the relationship. Elated with his newfound status as exclusive kosher caterer to Le Parc, Beverly Hills' president Raphy Amar is also thrilled with the way he's been received by Le Parc's ownership, which he deems "extremely supportive. Everyone here is focused on satisfying clients in every possible way, and that makes us totally compatible. It's no secret that Le Parc has always been my facility of choice, and formalizing the arrangement just makes it a little easier and more convenient for me to offer the community the very best." To that end, Raphy is now actively booking functions at Le Parc for the coming months of '95 and '96.

Permanent kosher kitchen

To better meet the needs of its ever-growing Jewish clientele, the management of Le Parc (headed by John Verdone and Italo Cellupica) has decided to install a permanent kosher kitchen on the premises. Functions will continue to be offered under strict supervision, with a mashgiach on the premises throughout the event.

For you the prospective simcha-maker, the union of these two catering frontrunners is a marriage made in heaven. In Le Parc, you get a facility second to none in Canada, master chefs, and a kitchen staff thoroughly schooled in the fine arts of food preparation, presentation, and service. In Beverly Hills Caterers, you get Raphy Amar (a master caterer in his own right), who for ten years in Los Angeles catered kosher functions at the Beverly Wilshire Hotel, the Century Plaza Hotel, and the Beverly Hills Hotel, among others. During this period he was also the exclusive kosher caterer at Beth Jacob Synagogue, L.A.'s largest orthodox congregation.

Raphy's association with Le Parc complements his position as kosher caterer in residence at Adath Sholom Synagogue.

Raphy has much to offer on both the religious and culinary fronts. He is a Shomer Shabbos caterer and can meet any requirements, including Lubavitch Schechita. Mechitsas can be arranged on request.

His menus run an eclectic gamut from Continental to Italian to Chinese to Middle Eastern. You can enjoy the fruits of his labours on site or off site in your home or office.

The culinary fun begins well before the main course. Raphy enthusiastically recommends the New York style smorgasbord, featuring hand-cut Montreal smoked meat, carved turkey, poached salmon, and other delectable delights.

Le Parc's reputation as la crème de la crème of catering facilities, now further enhanced by the installation of a kosher kitchen, is accompanied by a welcome surprise: affordable prices. John and Raphy have put together a fabulous selection of dining packages at highly competitive prices. That's right: kosher functions, at Le Parc, at competitive prices.

Functions competitively priced

From the physical standpoint, Le Parc boasts a number of features which distinguish it not only from other Toronto establishments but from almost any other catering establishment in North America.

Its five splendid dining halls each have their own separate entrances from outside the building. And what entrances they are: your passage through stately vine-clad arches is a great "chuppa rehearsal"! Inside, more foliage: sprawling skylights spanning the building's exterior give light and life to lush vegetation amid cascading fountains — an ideal backdrop for any chuppa arrangement.

Separate entrances to each hall

Each of these halls (ranging in capacity from 150 to 1,000 people) boasts its own foyer with piano, private bar, dance floor, and bride's room. Each hall is a little world unto itself which affords you and your guests complete privacy.

Other amenities include ample free parking and free coat checking.

This is no run-of-the-mill catering facility. You really have to visit the premises to appreciate their scope and scale, underscoring the fact that they were designed with simchas in mind.

And not just simchas. During the week, Le Parc slips effortlessly into its alter ego as a conference centre catering to an extensive corporate clientele with the same devotion and standard of excellence that it does to its banquet guests. The corporate services department, under the direction of Beryl Macleod, is now able to offer kosher meals prepared right on the premises.

Corporate catering a specialty

Go ahead, pinch yourself. Then pick up the phone. This is one simcha scenario where you really can have it all.

Hebrew Culture Club lets students discuss issues

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It looks like a typical classroom, but the aroma of kosher pizza and Murphy Brown on the television quickly dispel the notion that this is an ordinary class.

In fact, it's the after-school Hebrew Culture Club at William Lyon Mackenzie Collegiate Institute, first of its kind in Toronto and the prototype for six others in Canada — four in the Toronto area, one in Ottawa and one in Montreal.

The club at Mackenzie became a reality in January 1994, after Sarah Friedman, then a Grade 9 student, approached Glenn Black, regional director of the National Conference of Synagogue Youth, to see if he would facilitate the group.

Friedman, an NCSY member, had participated in a similar group when her family spent a year in Baltimore.

The Hebrew Culture Club, run by Black and endorsed by school administration, is not affiliated with NCSY. It is free of charge to interested students, including non-Jews.

On the day The CJN visited the group, Black, 25, was using the Murphy Brown episode as a springboard for a discussion of life and death. With a mix of anecdotes, textual references and thought-provoking questions, Black led an animated but serious teen discussion.

For Amiel Blajchman, 17, a day school alumnus, the club is his only current forum for Jewish learning. "I ask Glenn questions I'd ask my rabbi. I'm learning more about my Jewish heritage than [ever]."

For Jason Swirsky, 17, the club has served as support while he has become more religious. The change, he stressed, was not a result of his participation in the club.

Although the program has a strong educational aspect, Black attempts to dispel the classroom feeling. Pizza is served every week, and Black encourages students to sit on their desks if they like.

Shira Spring, 16, feels the club, which has served as catalyst for some new friendships, is uniting the Jewish community. "You've got youth from every youth group, and unaffiliated," she said.

Diverse views on peace process

EFRAT — Members of a Toronto UJA mission came face to face recently with Israel's divisions on the peace process.

Rabbi Shlomo Riskin, the founder of the West Bank community of Efrat, vowed before mission participants to organize civilian patrols if the Israeli army moves out of Bethlehem.

Riskin argued strongly against further Israeli government negotiations with the PLO. "We picked the wrong partner," he said. "This peace process is a disaster. I'm in favor of peace, but this is not peace."

Later, Peace Now's Amiram Goldbloom warned mission participants of another intifadah if the opposition Likud party comes to power.

Goldbloom opposes redeployment as well, because he believes Israel should leave the West Bank completely and disband Jewish settlements.

According to Mideast analyst Dr. Gerald Steinberg, who also briefed UJA mission members, "the Israeli army is very unenthusiastic about redeployment and Arafat is very unenthusiastic about elections, because he's unsure of his popularity."

Steinberg said Israeli opinions on the peace process are somewhere between the "new Middle East euphoria" of Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and "a sense of disaster."

Rabbi Weinberg to leave Eitz Chaim after 37 years

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO —Rabbi Shneur K. Weinberg, for 37 years a senior administrator at Eitz Chaim Schools, will retire at the end of this school year.

He will be succeeded by Rabbi Aaron Levine.

Rabbi Weinberg was encouraged to come to Toronto in 1958 by then senior principal Rabbi Chaim Nussbaum. Starting out as a rebbe (Hebrew studies teacher) in the day school and principal of the evening school, since 1971 he has been senior principal.

Three of his four children and his sons-in-law are also working in education. He credits their involvement to the fact that "I feel good about what I've done in my life — very positive."

Acknowledging that there can be aggravation, nevertheless, he says, "teaching and having an impact [on students] gives a satisfaction that other endeavors don't."

Some of his most gratifying experiences, he told The CJN in an interview in his Patricia campus office, came from working in the now defunct Eitz Chaim evening school, and from evening schools he was involved with in Detroit.

Most of the kids, he said, came from non-observant families, and were open to religous influence. "It's gratifying when you take a kid from a different environment, and turn him around to become a shomer mitzvot."

Times were different when he started teaching, he mused. "People were occupied about making a living. They didn't trust that you could get a good secular education at a day school.

"Now, of course, the day school secular education is better than in the public schools," he said.

The children have changed too, he said, as society has changed — and "mostly for the worse."

It was not considered acceptable to blatantly question and challenge, either parents or teachers, he said.

Now, he said, we have to treat kids differently. "There's nothing wrong with that — you get more out of a student if you do — but kids have to learn to obey. There has to be some sense of derech eretz (respect)."

Parents also have changed, he said. "They expect more professionalism [in Jewish education]. Thank G-d we can provide that."

He is very proud of what he has done at Eitz Chaim, citing particularly the school's participation in the UJA campaign.

Not wanting the students, for various reasons, to take part in the walkathon, he instituted the learnathon. Shortly before Shavuot, the students spend a day studying Torah subjects, and listening to guest speakers.

Just as the marchers do, the youngsters get sponsors. This year, the boys' school alone raised close to $11,000.

The German-born rabbi has a few regrets — just a few. He would have liked to do more serious Torah study. "Now, with my lessened workload, I hope to do more."

Rabbi S. K. Weinberg

Most of all, he notes, somewhat wistfully, "I wish I could have taught more."

Rabbi Weinberg has no intention of just sitting around. He has accepted a position of menahel (principal) of the afternoon Hebrew studies program at Yeshivat Nachlas Tzvi and educational director of its general studies program.

As well, he will act as consultant to Eitz Chaim and to several smaller schools in the United States.

He will be honored at a tribute dinner on June 26, at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in Thornhill.

Israel Scout Friendship Caravan at Mel Lastman Square.

Israel Scout group entertains

TORONTO — A capacity crowd of close to 1,000 assembled for the Israel Scout Friendship Caravan at Mel Lastman Square this month.

Ten Israeli members of the Israel Boy & Girls Scout Federation danced and sang as part of the annual North American summer tour, which is meant to bring the message of commitment to Israel and world friendship.

The five boys and five girls are part of a delegation of 52 serving as counsellors in North American summer camps.

The Toronto concert opened with the Israel Scout Song Shir Hatzofim and closed with Hatikvah.

"The Scouts of Israel have always played a major role since the establishment of the state in communal and environmental service, but most important in the teaching of volunteerism," said Israeli Consul Haim Waxman.

The Israel Scouts went on to perform at a day school before leaving for Kingston, Ottawa and Montreal.

In Kingston they put on one community show and one in Winston Churchill Public School.

In Ottawa they were scheduled to perform for the 80th anniversary of the 39th Henry "Hank" Torontow Scout Group and for the students of Hillel Academy Jewish Day School.

In Montreal they were scheduled to perform at the YM-YWHA and the Jewish Nursing Home.

The Toronto visit was co-sponsored by the Jewish Advisory Committee on Scouting & Guiding and United Israel Appeal of Canada Inc.

Media called essential in fighting hatemongers

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The media are the first line of attack in exposing hatemongers, Bernie Farber told delegates to the annual conference of the Canadian Association of Statutory Human Rights Agencies (CASHRA).

Farber, national director of Community Relations of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), was part of a panel on how to use the media to respond to hatred. The discussion focused on the strengths and weaknesses of the media in covering hate groups and how human rights agencies and other anti-racist groups can help and educate journalists.

Farber used the two trials of Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel to highlight the media's strengths and weaknesses.

Reporters covering the first trial in 1984-85 were not well prepared, he charged. Testimony was reported uncritically and lies repeated and given equal time with the testimony of survivors and scholars, Farber said.

By the second trial three years later, lessons had been learned, he noted. Gone were the misleading headlines, and the prosecution's case was covered well. The question Farber posed is whether the lessons have been sustained.

"The media must maintain its focus and not allow itself to be manipulated by the new lexicon of the hate groups," he said. "Holocaust denier David Irving made a lot of news a couple of years ago while trying to organize a speaking tour across Canada. Most papers referred to him as a controversial historian and author or historical revisionist. That is misleading."

In her remarks, anti-racist Ottawa youth leader Alicia Reckzin faulted the media for their portrayal of anti-racist youth as thugs and misfits. She cited an example where 50 neo-Nazis attacked a group of three anti-racists.

"The next day, the media seemed to be saying the anti-racists deserved the beating they received," she said. "I agree with [Farber] that the media need to be educated about the far right."

Jon Breen, chair of the Yukon Human Rights Commission, noted that the media prefer to cover events rather than processes.

"We have to be able to take strong positions put in a dramatic way, just as the extreme right does, to capture the media's attention," he said.

In trying to relate to reporters and the media, Farber recommended that CASHRA delegates expose hate groups "reasonably"; avoid getting caught up in hatemongers' euphemisms and the trap of debating free speech; and offer reporters context, balance and expertise.

Jewish students' group thrives at WLU

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Yes, there is a Jewish presence at Wilfrid Laurier University, and Heath Applebaum wants everyone to know about it.

The 21-year-old political science/philosophy student was the driving force behind the Waterloo, Ontario university's Jewish Students Association (JSA), formed this past year.

Two years ago the native Torontonian became involved in the Jewish campus group at nearby University of Waterloo, four blocks from Laurier.

He soon decided that his own school could use a similar club, and put together a proposal for a Jewish club at Laurier early last year.

About 50 Jewish students, along with some interested non-Jewish students, have signed up, and at least 10 Jewish professors have become involved in an advisory capacity.

Applebaum credits Susan Jackson of Canadian Jewish Congress for giving the group ideas and support and for paving the way for them to receive funding of approximately $1,500 from the Council of Jewish Federations' campus services committee. (A modest allocation from the university rounds out their budget.)

"You have to mention Susan. Nothing would have happened if it weren't for her," insists Applebaum.

Jackson is equally adamant that Applebaum "shouldn't be Mr. Modest." She cites his energy, determination and sensitivity to others as factors in the JSA's success. "If this isn't Jewish continuity, what is?" she asks.

"I felt this was something that needed to be done," says Applebaum, who traces his interest in Israel and Judaism to the summer he spent in Israel several years ago on the Canadian Zionist Federation's Kibbutz Encounter Program.

This summer he will return to Israel to pursue third-year university studies at Tel Aviv University.

Executive members of the Jewish Students Association at Wilfrid Laurier University got together before the group's wine and cheese party. From left are Jordan Rotman, Heath Applebaum, Vivian Horovitch, Jen Guia, Scott MacGregor and Michael Rosenblatt.

He will be succeeded as JSA president by Jennifer Golder and Erin Rows, who will serve as co-presidents.

Laurier was Applebaum's first choice of universities, he told The CJN, and he doesn't want others to be discouraged by a perceived lack of Jewish students. "The university's only one hour from Toronto, and it's got a fabulous business program and MBA program. Laurier's a very small school, the classes are small, [so] you don't feel intimidated asking questions."

The school's Jewish students are interested in staying involved in the Jewish community, but don't want to be isolated from their non-Jewish peers, Applebaum noted. He was involved in the school's new interfaith council, of which the JSA was a founding member.

Over the past year the JSA has co-hosted events with the University of Waterloo's Jewish Students' Association, and has invited students from the University of Guelph, less than 30 minutes away by car, to its programs.

Programming has included a wine and cheese party and a Shabbat dinner, both of which were co-hosted by Kitchener's Beth Jacob Synagogue.

Plans for the coming year include looking into establishing a Hillel-type house together with the University of Waterloo, said incoming co-president Golder. Programming will include Jewish-themed movie nights and "continuing what we started last year."

Klein, Lastman seek business in Israel

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For a while, it looked like something unprecedented was about to happen: three levels of Canadian government converging on Israel to explore business and trade opportunities.

But late last week, federal Treasury Board president Art Eggleton announced that due to pressing concerns at home, he would not be going to Israel this week, as planned.

That leaves Alberta Premier Ralph Klein and North York, Ont. Mayor Mel Lastman both leading economic missions to the Jewish state this week.

Eggleton cancelled the trip because of several "pressing pieces of legislation" before the House of Commons, aide Allan Kaufman told The CJN on Friday. The trip will be re-scheduled but it's not known when, Kaufmann added.

Eggleton was due to greet Air Canada's maiden flight from Toronto to Israel on June 21 and to take part in several business conferences aimed at boosting Canada-Israel ties.

He was also scheduled to open the Halbert Centre for Canadian Studies at Hebrew University in Jerusalem and hold talks with Foreign Minister Shimon Peres.

Lastman's mission, from June 14-25, has taken about a dozen North York businesspeople to Israel to explore new markets and joint ventures.

Klein, who arrived in Israel Saturday from Europe and is scheduled to leave for Lebanon this Thursday, is also plumbing new opportunities for Alberta in manufacturing, agriculture, mining, hi-tech industries and other sectors.

Both politicians were on hand for the fifth Business Forum, held in Haifa this week. The three-day conference was designed to develop joint ventures and facilitate business contacts.

Klein's itinerary includes stops at the Canada Centre in Metulla, Yad Vashem and various tourist attractions. He's scheduled to visit Calgary's Project Renewal twin city, Mazkeret Batya, as well as the Edmonton-Israel Project, which seeks to renovate a dormitory at Kiryat Hachinuch, an education centre in Jerusalem.

Also on the agenda are talks with Palestinian spokesperson Ziad Abu-Ziad.

A dinner for Klein was hosted on Tuesday by Israel's industry and trade minister, Micha Harish, after the two signed a memorandum of understanding.

Later this week, Klein is to address the Canada-Israel Free Trade Symposium, set up after free trade talks between the two countries were initiated last year.

Air Canada goes to Israel

The Air Canada flights represent the airline's first entry into the Middle East. According to Robertson, the service has already proven popular. "The phones have been ringing off the hook since we made the announcement."

The mood at Air Canada's newly-opened office at 59 Ben-Yehuda St. in Tel Aviv has also been upbeat. "I was told that even before they finished painting and laying the carpet, people were walking in off the street, saying 'Shalom, mazel tov, good luck,'" Robertson said.

El Al offers direct service from Toronto and Montreal, but Air Canada presently offers direct non-stop service from Toronto only. However, the airline eventually plans to offer a direct flight from Montreal over a European gateway.

Air Canada's entry into the Israeli market has given Canadian travellers more direct flight options to Israel than ever before.

Air Canada flights depart from Toronto on Tuesdays and Thursdays at 9:15 p.m. and arrive in Tel Aviv at 3:50 p.m. the next day. Total flying time is about 11½ hours.

By comparison, El Al offers weekly flights on Monday and Wednesday, with an added Sunday flight in high season (beginning June 11). Its flights depart Toronto at 11:20 a.m., stop in Montreal, depart again at 1:50 p.m., and arrive in Tel Aviv at 7:10 a.m. the next day. Total travel time is about 13½ hours from Toronto, 11 hours from Montreal.

Many travellers from Toronto and western Canada may prefer Air Canada's shorter flying time and mid-afternoon arrival, when hotels are better prepared to receive guests.

Air Canada flies the twin-aisle 767-300 extended range aircraft with 35 executive first seats, and 166 seats in hospitality class (economy). El Al flies the larger, two-deck 747 aircraft, with about 12 seats in first class, 42 in business class, and 420 in economy. The 55 inches of leg room — officially known as seat pitch — offered in Air Canada's executive first cabin "is the most of any airline flying today," said Robertson. No leg room statistic was available from El Al.

While both airlines offer frequent flyer programs, Air Canada is offering double points for all passengers to Tel Aviv before July 31. Frequent flyers on El Al who make 31/2 round trips in economy within one year are eligible for a free return ticket from Toronto or Montreal upon completion of their fifth return trip.

Pricing on both airlines is competitive. On El Al, return economy fares begin at $1,338 from Toronto, $1,253 from Montreal. Air Canada's lowest listed fare is $1,299. On both airlines, a full business-class fare from Toronto is $5,372.

In recent months, some travel agents have offered discounted fares for either airline that have gone as low as $849 return.

Geneticist honored by Mount Sinai

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — More than 400 guests turned out for a recent gala tribute to Dr. Lou Siminovitch, the founding director of Mount Sinai Hospital's research institute and an internationally renowned geneticist.

Siminovitch, 65, is now director emeritus of the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute but said his sense of fulfillment does not rest solely on his scientific accomplishments. "I value, as much, or even more the large number of collaborators and friends with whom I have been associated with along the way."

After receiving his PhD in chemistry from McGill University in 1944 and a stint working at the Canadian atomic energy program, Siminovitch studied at the Pasteur Institute in Paris with researchers who went on to receive Nobel Prizes for their work in genetics and molecular biology.

A scientist at the Ontario Cancer Institute from 1956 until 1969, he became geneticist-in-chief at the Hospital for Sick Children in 1970. He left there in 1985 to establish Mount Sinai's research facility.

Siminovitch is a national treasure and one of the architects of modern medical science, said Dr. Henry Friesen, the president of the Medical Research Council of Canada. "He recognized the absolute fundamental revolution that was upon us with molecular biology and genetics. He built that discipline, he created a foundation for that movement here in Toronto."

The current director of Mount Sinai's research institute said the "outstanding" scientific institutions and departments at Mount Sinai, the Sick Kids, the Ontario Cancer Institute and the University of Toronto were built by Siminovitch. "It was his vision, and his determination, and his demand for excellence that created and sustained these groupings," said Dr. Alan Bernstein. "It's an amazing track record of accomplishments, one which I doubt has been ever equalled anywhere by anyone in science."

Dr. John Evans, a founder of McMaster University's medical school, called Siminovitch a tireless worker, through good times and bad, for every facet of science.

To honor Siminovitch, Mount Sinai is establishing the Dr. Lou Siminovitch Young Scientist Fund to attract international scientists and fellows.

Teacher training program

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — York University is home to a unique Jewish teacher training program with a growing enrolment.

The program, which began 15 years ago with two students and which now trains 30 students each year, is run by York's Centre for Jewish Studies.

Coordinator Martin Lockshin says it is the only program of its kind outside of Israel. Accreditation is offered by both the Jewish and secular school systems: graduates are certified to teach general or Jewish studies by both the Ontario Ministry of Education and the Toronto Board of Jewish Education.

Program graduates are teaching at the Associated Hebrew Schools, United Synagogue Day School, Leo Baeck Day School, Bialik Hebrew Day School, the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and other Hebrew and public schools.

"We are training teachers who we hope can be role models for Canadian Jewish kids," said centre director Michael Brown.

Trainees take courses with visiting professors from the University of British Columbia, Ben Gurion University, Hebrew University and Haifa University.

The centre is hosting a conference on Creating the Jewish Future for October 1996.

The Centre for Jewish Studies offers courses in Canadian Jewish history, Canada-Israel Relations, Contemporary and Medieval Jewish Thought, as well as Jews in Film, Sport, Recreation and Leisure.

IDF soldiers killed in Lebanon ambush

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Three IDF soldiers were killed and three wounded last Sunday morning when their patrol was ambushed near Tibnit, in the eastern sector of the security zone in Lebanon.

Killed were Sgt. Hillel Rosner, 19, of Tel Aviv; Warrant Officer Hisham Rakhal Hayeb, 31, a father of six; and Warrant Officer Ahni Mohammed Hayeb, 29, a father of two. The two warrant officers were Bedouin trackers from the village of Zarzir in the Jezreel Valley.

Hezbollah issued a statement in Beirut taking responsibility for the attack, which military sources depict as a further escalation in south Lebanon.

"Hezbollah is operating under the notion of an impending Israeli-Syrian deal and this attack is part of a broader effort to assert its control over the south," a senior officer said.

After hearing of the attack, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin told visiting Irish foreign minister, Dick Spring, that the "events in south Lebanon are not confidence-building steps from Syria."

Tsomet leader Rafael Eitan said Israel must free itself from political restraints and hit Hezbollah with its full force.

"If [Syrian President Hafez] al-Assad wants peace, he must understand unequivocally that terrorism in Lebanon must cease," Religious Affairs Minister Shimon Shetreet said.

The soldiers, from a Givati Brigade unit, were on a routine road-clearing mission, when they were attacked from two directions, with machine guns and RPGs from a house on the outskirts of Nabatiya, and with mortar fire from terraces in Tibnit.

The initial debriefing indicated that the soldiers immediately deployed in attack positions returned fire and then assaulted the ambushing force. Army sources confirmed that the soldiers killed at least three of the attackers and wounded several others.

As the Hezbollah force began dispersing, heavy mortar fire landed on the area where a group of soldiers were organizing themselves for pursuit.

Rosner was killed instantly. As Ahni Hayeb and Hisham Hayeb rushed to assist him, another mortar shell hit, fatally wounding them and wounding three other soldiers, one moderately and two lightly.

Sharansky says goal is to strengthen the Jewish people

"What has happened over the past 10 years is that each government has ignored the first pillar of Zionism for the sake of the second. No government has developed any systematic strategies for strengthening the people, as if assimilation were not eating away at the Jews, as if there was not a widening gap between us and the Diaspora. That must change."

This, he repeated was the movement's sole raison d'etre. "We will ensure that the building of the people must be a high priority for the next government, equal to the maintenance of Israel's security."

Sharansky pointed out that his movement is broadly based. Its founding executive includes Israelis from Russia, Ethiopia, the United States and Canada. Zvi Weinberg, formerly of Toronto, now teaching at Bar Ilan University, is a member of the executive. "Israel B'aliyah is not a party of Russians, although " no doubt at the beginning most voters for the party will be Russian."

When asked about the party's policy on the peace process, Sharansky responded that they had not yet formulated one. "Our views will not be bait for either the Likud or Labor. Among our group we have former activists from Likud, Labor, Mafdal (The National Religious Party) and Meretz. We will start developing a platform on the peace process in the future. But it will have appropriate red lines."

Commenting upon the widening factional divisions developing in the Jewish world, as evidenced by the fierce debate surrounding the peace process, he said ,"The heart of the problem is in Israel. This division is not only a problem of the Galut. There is a temptation to delegitimize the opposition. It starts with the leaders." He elaborated on this by returning to the original point he had made about Israel B'aliyah.

"Part of the problem has been that for so long governments here have ignored the people. If we had been stronger on this issue, had devoted more time to building the people, we could have developed a different culture of discussion and debate. Questions of peace and of war would be dealt with in a more mature way."

He pointed to the leadership of the new movement as possible harbingers of hope in the vital task of helping to heal the growing internal rift. "Because of our past experience of uniting disparate communities inside the Soviet Union, our feeling of mutual historical fate is more important than any feeling which might separate us."

No East Jerusalem council: Peres

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service and Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — In an effort to underline its political claims to the city, the Palestinian leadership plans to establish its own city council in Jerusalem, senior PLO sources said last week.

The decision to revive the 12-member council that administered eastern Jerusalem until the 1967 Six Day War was approved at the weekly meeting of the Palestinian Authority (PA).

But it was immediately denounced by Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, who reportedly warned that the council will not be allowed to operate.

The PA's decision is likely to renew tensions between Israel and the Palestinians over the future of the city, after controversy erupted last month as a result of Israeli plans for land expropriations in eastern Jerusalem.

Talks on the status of Jerusalem are scheduled to begin in May 1996.

Last year, the Knesset passed legislation barring the PA from operating inside Israel and Jerusalem.

The former deputy mayor of eastern Jerusalem, Amin Majaj, said PLO leader Yasser Arafat met with former council members last week in Jericho.

Arafat informed them that he had decided to revive the Jerusalem council, and he promised to provide them with financial and administrative support, according to Majaj.

Palestinian official Faisal Husseini said Majaj, 74, would be named the new mayor of eastern Jerusalem.

"With this council, we can do things to help our community," said Husseini.

Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert was not immediately available for comment.

But Peres reportedly vowed last week that the council will not be allowed to operate.

"Jerusalem is united. There is no additional municipality and will not be. What they [the PA] decide or say has no value," Peres was quoted as telling the Knesset's foreign affairs and defence committee.

Peres stressed that Jerusalem is outside the PA's purview, and that while guests of Palestinian residents of the city could visit Orient House, the PA's east Jerusalem headquarters, the Oslo accords forbid the holding of meetings with the PA there.

Peres told the committee that two issues concerning the Palestinian elections remain to be solved: Who could be elected and whether polls would be set up in east Jerusalem.

Referendum promised on Syrian peace deal

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — Any deal with Syria will go into effect only after being approved in a referendum, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres said Wednesday.

"Before [reaching such an agreement] we have nothing to ask the people," Peres said. "If we have an agreement, we will bring it to the people."

Earlier, U.S. peace envoy Dennis Ross was quoted as saying a referendum would be held after the two sides sign a treaty.

Ross added it was "logical" to assume Israel would not agree to an accord that it did not believe the public would support.

Peres was answering questions at a Jerusalem luncheon given in his honor by World Jewish Congress President Edgar Bronfman.

Peres reiterated that "the land of the Golan Heights belongs to the Syrians."

Stressing the need to help the Palestinain Authority, Peres said Arab states should take an example from world Jewry. He specifically took the Saudis to task for not fulfilling pledges, saying that they had reneged an a $35 million aid offer to the Palestinians.

"Israel's security depends a great deal on the self-esteem of the Palestinians," he said. "I never dreamt the day would come when I would try to get money for them."

Later, while addressing the Knesset's foreign affairs committee, Peres defended his view of the Golan Heights as Syrian territory.

"Perhaps my statements paved the way in some part to a peace agreement with Syria," he was reported to have said.

He said the Labor Party platform, which calls for retaining the Golan, has been overtaken by new realities. He compared Labor's policy to the Likud platform during the Sinai withdrawal.

IDF prepares to leave four West Bank cities

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The Israel Defence Force (IDF) is reportedly ready to withdraw troops from four cities in the West Bank.

Senior military sources told the Israeli daily Ha'aretz last week that the IDF is ready to pull out of Jenin, Nablus, Tulkarm and Kalkilya.

The sources said differences have arisen with the Palestinians over their demand that the pullback also include Ramallah and Bethlehem.

These cities are more problematic for Israel, they added, because of the level of terrorist activities there and because of their proximity to Jerusalem.

The sources said even though the army is ready to begin preparations for an initial redeployment, the ultimate decision will be made by Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and PLO leader Yasser Arafat.

U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher, meeting with Arafat in Jericho last weekend, reportedly urged the PLO leader to accept a partial pullout of Israeli troops from the four cities.

During the meeting, which came as part of Christopher's latest round of Middle East shuttle diplomacy, the secretary reportedly said the Palestinian Authority would get more aid from foreign donor countries if Arafat accepted the idea of a partial pullout.

Israel and the PLO have set July 1 as a target date for reaching agreement on implementing the next phase of Palestinian self-rule, which includes the withdrawal of Israeli troops from Arab population centres in the West Bank and the holding of Palestinian elections.

Palestinian official Faisal Husseini, speaking after the Christopher-Arafat meeting, called a partial Israeli withdrawal unacceptable, saying, "There will be no elections before the full redeployment of Israeli troops from the West Bank, and that is final."

The Declaration of Principles signed by Israel and the PLO in September 1993 is vague about the extent of the withdrawal. It stipulates only that Israeli troops be "redeployed outside populated areas" in the West Bank, with "further redeployments" to be accomplished gradually.

U.S. lawmakers at odds over aid to PLO

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — On the same day last week that one member of the United States Congress unveiled legislation designed to cut off funds to the PLO, another announced an agreement that would allow money to continue to flow — at least temporarily.

Rep. Benjamin Gilman (R-N.Y.) announced that Congress would seek to extend the Middle East Peace Facilitation Act for 90 days.

The act, which expires at end of the month, allows U.S. aid to flow to the PLO, and American diplomats to talk to its representatives.

"Because the House and Senate can't complete its work on this important legislation by the end of the month, it is our intention to extend this act temporarily, for no more than 90 days," Gilman said in an address to 100 Orthodox rabbis in town to lobby against aid to the PLO.

Gilman sounded a stern warning to Yasser Arafat and the Palestinian Authority (PA).

"The PLO is going to lose U.S. assistance if it does not act quickly and forcefully to live up to its promises. Patience is wearing very thin. The American people and the Congress will be extremely hard pressed to commit the United States to commit anymore of our scare financial resources."

The U.S. has pledged $500 million to the PLO over five years. About $100 million has already been sent to the PA.

At the same session, aides to Sen. Alfonse D'Amato (R-N.Y.) unveiled legislation that would cut off all U.S. financial assistance to the PA.

Under the proposed legislation, no funding would ever go directly to the PLO or the PA. Instead, funds could only go to independent Palestinian institutions under certain conditions.

The measure would require the PLO to comply with its accords with Israel — including amending its covenant, which calls for the destruction of the Jewish state — in order for the money to flow to any Palestinians.

"The PLO's overwhelming failure to restrain the radical elements within its areas of control is an insult to Israel and everyone who had placed hope in Yasser Arafat's ability to deliver the peace," D'Amato said.

The legislation also would require Arafat to assist U.S. law enforcement officials in solving past murders of American citizens by people believed to be connected to the PLO.

"The PLO is not complying with its responsibilities," D'Amato said on the Senate floor last week as he introduced his bill.

"It has failed to restrain the radicals in Gaza. It has failed to change the PLO Covenant. It has failed to come clean with the amount of its assets."

"This bill is not the panacea. Nor is it the popular thing to do. It is however the right thing to do," D'Amato said. "I want peace for Israel as much or more than anyone else, but I do not want it on the wrong terms."

The measure cites the PLO's failure to prevent terrorism, control the flow of illegal weapons into and inside Gaza, prosecute and punish accused terrorists.

D'Amato's bill is also critical of the PLO for allowing its police force to grow to over 17,000 when only 9,000 are permitted under its accords with Israel.

The measure would also cut off funds to Palestinian institutions unless the PLO stops conducting business in Jerusalem.

The Orthodox rabbis "unequivocally endorsed" D'Amato's bill.

"Without compliance peace is nothing but a farce, a sham, a piece of paper," said Rabbi Steven Pruzansky, a spokesman for the group. "The American people should not support sending American taxpayers money to a terrorist organization."

Jackson backtracks

CJN Wire Services

LOS ANGELES — Pop superstar Michael Jackson apologized last Friday for using lyrics that Jewish groups said could promote anti-Semitism, and agreed to include an explanation in unshipped copies of his new album.

The superstar backtracked following criticism of the song They Don't Care About Us from both the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and the Simon Wiesenthal Centre. In it, Jackson sings: "Jew me/Sue me/Everybody/Do me/Kick me/Kike me/Don't you/Black or white me."

Jackson initially said the song — from the album HIStory: Past, Present and Future — Book I, which went on sale June 20 — was supposed to draw attention to the pain of prejudice and hate, and to social and political problems.

However the groups feared young people would hear the offensive language and not get the nuances. In response to the criticism, Jackson issued a public apology.

"I very much regret and apologize from the bottom of my heart if I have hurt anyone's feelings in conveying my own," the 36-year-old performer said in a statement.

Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, said that a distraught Jackson called him Thursday evening to apologize for the lyrics.

"He was emotional, he was initially very emphatic," Rabbi Cooper said. "He wanted to make sure that we understood where he was coming from and not to misconstrue how we feel about him as a person.

The rabbi said he accepted Jackson's apology and had no doubt as to his original intentions. However, he was concerned that many other people at Jackson's Epic Records label must have seen the lyrics but never reacted.

G-7 leaders reject nuclear role for Iran

HALIFAX — At the conclusion of their summit here last week, the G-7 leaders of the world's largest industrial nations urged the world not to help Iran develop nuclear weapons — a statement Israel had been seeking.

In their final statement after the three-day summit, G-7 leaders, with Russian President Boris Yeltsin at their side, said, "We call on all states to avoid any collaboration with Iran which might contribute to the acquisition of a nuclear weapons capability."

G-7 countries have adopted stricter policies on nuclear cooperation with Iran, as they have with other countries, the statement said.

In the only reference to the Middle East, G-7 leaders called for peace treaties between Israel and Syria, and Israel and Lebanon.

The G-7 also noted the peace treaty between Israel and Jordan.

U.S. senator Dole envious, resentful of Jews, book says

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — U.S. Senator and Republican presidential frontrunner Robert Dole has "privately expressed envy and resentment of Jews," according to an unauthorized biography slated for release this fall.

Written by Stanley Hilton, a former aide and Senate counsel, the book, Senator for Sale, an unauthorized biography of Senator Bob Dole, claims Dole harbors anti-Semitic views.

In a full chapter dedicated to Dole's views on Jews and Israel, Summer Soldier for Israel: From Staunch Supporter to Angry Critic, Hilton also recounts Dole's stance of the late 1980s, which was widely categorized as anti-Israel.

"Dole sometimes privately expressed envy and resentment at Jews for having an unduly large amount of money, power and influence in the United States, and for bankrolling liberal Democrats' campaigns. Some he called Communists," Hilton writes in an advance copy of the book.

The allegations come as Dole is leading the charge to move the U.S. embassy in Israel from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem, a move many Jews support.

Hilton's book, scheduled to be published in September by St. Martin's Press, stops a step short of calling Dole an anti-Semite.

"Like his hero Richard Nixon and many other traditional WASP Republicans, Dole has sometimes been critical of Jews, their politics and their financial power," writes Hilton, a trial attorney living in San Francisco.

Dole's campaign spokesperson, Nelson Warfield, categorically denied Hilton's charges, labelling them "wild, unfounded accusations by a low-level staffer who had no direct access to the senator.

"Hilton displays the worst kind of commercial cynicism by throwing around the code words of anti-Semitism to sell a few books," he said. "Bob Dole's support for the Jewish people is clear and proven across a career of public service."

Hilton worked for Dole from 1978 to 1980.

In the past, Dole has been criticized in the Jewish community for calling for a five per cent cut to Israel's foreign aid in 1990, initially opposing loan guarantees to help Israel resettle Soviet Jews and withdrawing from a 1990 congressional initiative recognizing Jerusalem as Israel's capital.

The book also accuses Dole of harboring "a deep dislike of such Jewish politicians as [former] Congressman Dan Glickman, a bitter rival from Kansas, and Henry Kissinger."

Hilton claims Dole was bitter at not receiving Jewish money for his election campaigns, specifically in 1988, when he ran unsuccessfully against George Bush for the Republican presidential nomination.

Jewish supporters came to Dole's defense, saying the charges are "outrageous."

"This is another example of the tabloid trash that is being promoted in society these days," said Matt Brooks, executive director of the National Jewish Coalition, a Republican organization.

Surgeon invents and markets Lea's Shield contraceptive

TORONTO — Casablanca-born, Israeli-raised Dr. Shlomo Gabbay, a general surgeon, has always been interested in research.

Most of his work has been in developing new surgical instruments. But after his wife, Lea, had their third child, she demanded to know why he couldn't invent some sort of new contraceptive, one that would not pump unwanted drugs into the system but would be safe, effective and comfortable.

These requirements seemed to point to a barrier contraceptive, along the lines of a cervical cap, contraceptive sponge or diaphragm.

The difficulty with the diaphragms now available, the Gabbays told The CJN, is that they have to be fitted before use and sized again after childbirth, and they need to be removed after 12 hours. Perhaps worst of all, they say, is that for many women they simply are not acceptable.

Gabbay invented and is now marketing in Canada Lea's Shield (named after his wife), which is "one size fits all," cheap and reusable, and comfortable.

It is made of medical grade silicon rubber and contains a valve mechanism that allows air to be vented out during insertion, which helps prevent infection and odour.

Studies performed at the Feminist Women's Health Centre in Atlanta, as well as Baltimore, Phoenix, Norfolk and Chicago, were very positive, says health policy and management consultant Lynn Thogersen, who oversaw the research.

"The women had no problem in either inserting or removing it. They really liked it — the fact they could leave it in place for up to 48 hours and that it required less jelly than other barrier methods, making it less messy.

"They also liked [the fact] that because it is a barrier method, it doesn't affect the whole body all the time [as do hormonal contraceptives]."

More studies are being carried out, but in the studies already done, Lea's Shield was shown to be 95 per cent effective in preventing pregnancy, as opposed to regular barriers which are generally considered from 80 to 90 per cent effective.

Other planned uses include use as a pessary, to correct a prolapsed uterus.

Lea's Shield is being produced and marketed by Yama Inc. in New Jersey, a company operated by the Gabbays, and it is being marketed in Canada by Femina Inc. in Markham.

It can be obtained directly from a physician or at a pharmacy. No prescription is necessary. Femina also sells Lea spermicidal gel.

Two Views On Israel's Economy

JERUSALEM — Israel is "one of the most promising of the emerging markets anywhere," according to June's Lehman Brothers Global Economics report. The report forecasts a five per cent rise in GDP, which is above government forecasts of between four and five per cent.

The report also adjusted inflation forecasts downwards to between six and seven per cent, instead of 8.2 per cent.

Meanwhile the International Monetary Fund (IMF) warned Israel's ballooning balance of payments gap and rapid rate of underlying inflation, together with its costly pension reform plan, cloud the economy's prospects.

"A disturbing aspect of these developments has been that the widening of the external current account balance has been accompanied by a marked decline in private sector savings that has outstripped the increase in the overall rate of investment," the annual report states.

Bank Leumi Reports Quarterly Profits Up 64 Per Cent

The Bank Leumi Group reported a 64 per cent increase in profits in the first quarter of 1995 compared with the same period last year.

The Group's net profit, including translation adjustments, amounted to $55.8 million (US) compared with $34 million last year.

Taking a piece of Turkey home

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

ANTALYA, Turkey — There's a story told, perhaps apocryphal, perhaps not, about Israelis who visit this charming Mediterranean port city in droves.

Not only do the ubiquitous Israelis get their fill of the splendid scenery and cuisine, many also take their fill of Turkish mementoes, like hotel linen, towels, even drapes. Some saucy sabras have been known to bring home water faucets and other plumbing fixtures, while one enterprising Israeli came back for a second visit — armed with a tool kit, the better to remove the more stubbornly-attached bathroom fixtures.

Israeli consul general Itzhak Shoham discounts the stories, though he does not deny them, saying he can recall only one or two cases of "difficulties" caused by Israeli visitors.

The Turks don't seem to mind the visitors' hijinks, given that in 1994, 350,000 Israelis made Turkey their destination of choice.

With numbers like that and the dollars that are left behind, it's easy to overlook relatively minor misdeeds.

The sound of Hebrew-accented English and just plain Hebrew is heard everywhere in Turkey, particularly in the quaint port city of Antalya, one of Turkey's fast-growing tourism meccas.

Israelis contribute mightily to the Turkish economy and for their part, the Turks offer Israelis remarkable value for their dollar. On a recent visit to Turkey, only a two-hour flight north of Israel, we were told that airfare and five nights accomodation in comfortable hotels in Antalya set Israelis back about $350 US.

At a hotel in Lara, just east of Antalya, Israelis and Germans coexist cheek by jowl, with a smattering of Englishmen thrown in. Hotel billboards reflected that tourist traffic, with announcements posted in Hebrew (Motti's group will meet around 9 o'clock for a tour) smack dab next to a more urgent notice in German, headed with the harsher "achtung."

It's easy to see why Antalya is so popular.

The city's old port is surrounded by a medieval stone wall on a bluff above, while two breakwaters frame the port below. Single and twin-masted yachts and the odd fishing boat lay at anchor in the bright blue water.

The view of the port is beautiful at sea level but is absolutely stunning from atop the old city walls. Highly recommended is the Hisar Tesisi, a restaurant at Cumhuiyet Meydani P. Kutusu 216 with terraces overlooking the port and the city wall. The restaurant is set in a former fortress that dates back several centuries to Seljuk times, with an outdoor balcony that overlooks the port.

The restored old city, called the Kaleici, is a maze of cobbled streets and 17th century Ottoman houses and shops. Perfect for a stroll.

Shoppers take note. Shopping is much more relaxed than in most Mideastern locales. Turkish merchants will bargain ("best price, first customer," even if it's 6 p.m.), but they do take No for an answer without any hard feelings.

Antalya can serve as a base for several day and half-day trips nearby. Aspendos, about 50 kilometres to the east, is the site of a magnificently preserved Roman theatre that seated 15,000. The acoustics are first rate, as a climb to the nosebleed section will attest.

Travelling west of Antalya, visitors are treated to numerous beautiful panoramas as the coastal highway skirts secluded coves, rises to present vistas of the azure blue water below and is surrounded all the way with rough-hewn rock on either side of the road.

Southwest of Antalya is the ancient port of Phaselis at the foot of Mt. Tahtali (part of the Toros range). The city, whose heyday was early in the common era, is well preserved in a dreamlike setting. It features three separate harbors and the area is studded with the remnants of aqueducts, public squares, baths, a theatre and other ancient ruins.

The road from Antalya to Kas is a constant delight with the view overlooking Kas, a fishing village on the Mediterranean, particularly memorable.

Sotheby's offering collectors' Judaica

NEW YORK — On June 29, Sotheby's in New York will offer property from the collection of the late Michael and Doris Zagayski.

The sale of this extensive array of Judaica, 19th and 20th century paintings and sculpture, antiques, silver, rugs, furniture and decorative arts will benefit the Weizmann Institute of Science in Israel.

The bulk of the items will come from the contents of the Zagayski home in Palm Beach, Fla. This includes Marc Chagall's David with the head of Goliath, work by Jacques Lipchitz.

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

One of the first and most persuasive successes of the League of Nations, the international political body that prefigured the United Nations, was the resolution of the Aland (pronounced "Oh-land") Islands question in 1921.

This archipelago of about 10,000 islands, some 6,500 of which have names, is usually represented as a mere dot on the map midway between Finland and Sweden in the Baltic Sea.

The westernmost extremity of the Russian Empire until 1917, Aland's Swedish-speaking people initially sought to rejoin their mother country, Sweden. Ultimately, they became an autonomous, demilitarized province of Finland with their own flag, postage stamps and parliament.

After arriving in Helsinki recently on a direct Finnair flight from Toronto, I went to Turku, Finland's second-largest city. There we boarded an enormous Viking Line ferry (capacity 2,500) that powered westward for four hours to the Aland's capital, Mariehamn, a pretty maritime town of 10,300 with the antique sailing ship Pommern dominating the harbor.

Major sights of interest include the outstanding Maritime Museum adjacent to the Pommern, the partially restored medieval Kastelholm Castle, and the ruins of Bomarsund, a vast Russian fortress built to protect the Baltic gateway. Once populated by Russian soldiers, Bomarsund was blown up by British and French forces in 1854 during the Crimean War.

Bring good hiking boots

Many relics of Aland's military past survive, including portions of the fortress's thick walls and gigantic towers, rows of cannons, and several military cemeteries of various religious denominations. Good hiking boots are required for anyone wishing to visit the isolated Jewish cemetery, situated about a 40-minute trek into the bush. Only six gravestones are still visible at the site, which dates from the first half of the 19th century.

Bicycles and boats are highly popular modes of transport across these islands, whose rocky terrain and tall pines resemble Ontario cottage country. The Alands are serviced by regular and inexpensive ferries from Sweden and Finland.

According to Roger Nordlund, who sits on the executive council of the Aland government, the Crimean War was "something that just happened here." The province's former status as an outpost of the Russian Empire seems almost as remote as its earlier importance to the Vikings of a millenium ago, who used the islands as a stopover on journeys to Russia and Asia.

Nordlund's grandmother, born 85 years ago when the Aland Islands were part of Russia, could speak Russian. "Apparently, she and her sister played with the Russian soldiers, who treated them very nicely. That seems amazing to me because Russia and the Russian system seem so far away now."

Predilection for vodka

Alanders, who number about 26,000, are highly protective of their territory and culture. To apply for regional citizenship, prospective citizens must live here for five years, speak Swedish and apply for Finnish citizenship first. Only citizens can buy land, a measure designed to prevent the islands from becoming a summer playground for wealthy non-islanders.

Most Alanders know Finnish but prefer to speak Swedish; however, they still have many affinities with the Finns. Chief among these are a predilection for vodka, strong beer, reindeer meat, herring, flatbread and smoke saunas. As well, they presumably share the internal fortitude to survive the dreary darkness of December, when the sun hibernates.

The corollary is that many Alanders (like their counterparts on the Finnish mainland) seem to do largely without sleep in June and July, when the days grow long and the sun slips beneath the horizon only briefly each night. Bars, cafes and sidewalks are busy throughout the elongated twilight. Each evening, the orange-red ball of the sun hangs forever in the sky, as though the world has been plunged into suspended animation.

For more information on travel to Aland or the rest of Finland, contact the Finnish Tourist Board, 1200 Bay St., Suite 604, Toronto M5R 2A5, or phone 416-964-9159.

Anne Frank House: After winning a contest, 25 young girls from around the world named Anne met each other this month in Amsterdam, and visited the house where Anne Frank and her family hid from the Nazis. The event was staged by the Dutch airline, KLM, as part of its 75th anniversary celebrations. Called Bridging the World, the contest was meant to help bring people from different cultures together by means of air transport.

Arts

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

Edna Ferber Remembered: Born in 1887 to Jewish parents in Kalamazoo, Mich., American novelist and playwright Edna Ferber was a hard-working, overly modest, frequently self-effacing writer who read the critics too carefully and was too easily wounded by their sloppily-aimed slings and arrows.

Edna Ferber 1923

Convinced, for instance, that no one would want to read her novel So Big, she advised her publisher, Doubleday, that it was not worth publishing. Doubleday disagreed — and so did the committee that awarded her the Pulitzer Prize for So Big in 1924.

Likewise, Ferber initially thought it preposterous that a musical theatrical production could be based on her 1926 novel Show Boat. In the gay 1920s, musical theatre was lighthearted fare that rarely touched serious social issues. Show Boat, by contrast, dealt compassionately with miscegenation, racial prejudice and wife desertion.

The novel was an instant bestseller, prompting more than a dozen translations as well as radio serializations, stage plays and, in 1927, the masterful musical by Jerome Kern and Oscar Hammerstein. But it also prompted an astonishing number of lawsuits that were largely without merit. As the author wrote in her 1939 autobiography A Peculiar Treasure:

"Practically everyone in America — or so it seemed to me — now threatened to sue me for something or other they professed to find in the novel Show Boat. River captains I'd never heard of said I had used their boats; descendants of riverside saloon keepers announced that in using their ancestors' name I had defiled their fair escutcheon and wrecked their political careers; gambling-house owners threatened injunctions; and as a final horror there came a legal messenger from Cardinal Mundelein, of Chicago, saying that the chapter on the Chicago convent school to which Kim Ravenal was sent was an affront to the Church."

Despite this, Show Boat has become a revered piece of Americana with its own well-deserved niche in U.S. theatrical history.

Ferber, who died in 1968, also wrote Cimarron, Saratoga Trunk and Giant — all best-selling novels that were made into motion pictures — and co-wrote two plays, Dinner at Eight and Stage Door, with George S. Kaufman. But it is Show Boat that is arguably her best-remembered work, thanks largely to Kern and Hammerstein.

The last seven decades have seen literally hundreds of productions of the musical around the world. The latest major revival opened at the North York Center for the Performing Arts in October 1993 in a version produced by Garth Drabinsky of The Live Entertainment Co. and directed by Harold Prince. Again, the musical raised the ire of a gang of misguided protestors who, angry and implacable, accused the musical of being racist and — more outrageously — voiced the unprecedented charge that Edna Ferber's novel, much beloved for 70 years, was nothing more than "hate literature."

The Drabinsky-Prince production of Show Boat went on to win rave reviews and break box-office records. Although it closed in North York on June 11, it is continuing to play to near-capacity houses in New York, where it has won critical acclaim from even the American black press. Earlier this month, it garnered two coveted Tony Awards, for Best Director and Best Revival of A Musical.

Ferber would likely have been as agitated by the controversy as she would have been astounded by the musical's renewed success. She might also have been comforted at the power of large voices to resound down the ages while small voices die out even as their echoes fade. Eye On Arts congratulates Toronto's Garth Drabinsky, whose previous Tony Award for Kiss of the Spider Woman now has a well-deserved companion.

Books

I Am Come Into My Garden, by Allan Wargon (Somerville House, $24.95).

For the past 20 years Allan Wargon has been a virtual recluse. In his search for peace and solitude he built a home in a quiet, wooded section of Southern Ontario farm country. There he has busied himself with organic farming and creative writing.

Prior to his present life he was a successful film-maker and producer of TV shows.

Now, 70, he has written his first book based largely on his own life experience. Set down in lyrical prose — a kind of prolonged ode in free verse — it is a richly dramatic story about one man's need and longing for love and the unforseen problems that result when he finds it in the person of Esther. She is an independent, feisty, younger woman whose needs and inclinations are not always those of her far less flexible or pliant husband.

Basic Hebrew blessings

At one point Esther teaches her agnostic husband how to recite some basic Hebrew blessings. "She teaches it to me in Hebrew, word for word. Translated, it goes: Blessed be the Lord our God, King of the universe, who brings forth bread from the earth. For wine, I learn to say brings forth the fruit of the vine. It's simple enough, once I have it by rote, and decorative, and seems to call for some fond gesture — a look, a kiss, a touch of hands, that for a moment makes us mindful of each other before we begin to eat."

In beautifully cadenced brief paragraphs the author depicts a range of emotions in a tempestuous marriage. These include joy, mistrust, anxiety, truculence, contentment, jealously and gratitude.

When Esther invites her friends and neighbors to a seder, he is angered by her preemptory manner and decides not to attend. Afterwards, he decides, in an act of contrition, to clear up the post-seder mess.

"The dining room tables have been pushed back, chairs and benches overturned, sugar, crumbs and napkins scattered. The kitchen is cluttered with uneven stocks of dirty dishes, piles of platters, roasting pans, dozens of glasses with dregs of wine. A heap of greasy cutlery is soaking in the sink, while on the stove, congealed, are breakfast remnants of matzos and eggs. A disorder as complete as between Esther and me."

The book reaches its climax with the birth of a son to the exultant couple. "Her face is radiant; and as I look at it I see that sunlit joy, that passion, verve, wit, bright mind, free, wild spirit I first fell in love with. And, unbidden, that love comes stealing over me."

Without much of a plot or exciting high moments the reader is rewarded with Thoreau-like observations on the wonder of love, the mystery of sexuality, the beauty of an ever-changing landscape, the differing temperaments of men and women and the inexorability of death.

This is a book that should be read and savored slowly. It has important lessons to teach about life and love.

Making a Difference in Our Community

"Not one of us can do this work alone..."

noughts on Volunteers

Rabbi Wayne Allen
President, Toronto Board of Rabbis

The Talmud (Kiddushin 40b) records a second century debate on what is more important, study (Talmud) or action (Ma'asseh)? Rabbi Tarfon answered that action is more important than study. Rabbi Akiba retorted that study is more important because study leads to action. The sages finally agreed with Rabbi Akiba, not because action is of lesser value, but because it is of ultimate value. That is why the Tosafists (ad. loc. s.v. "Talmud") explain that once a person has learned the basics of Judaism, action - Ma'asseh - is always preferred.

Between Chapters 35 and 38 of the Book of Exodus the word Va-ya'as, "he made," appears no less than 39 times with regard to the construction of the Tabernacle. It would only have been necessary to mention the verb once, followed by a list of all the things made. That Bezalel, the master craftsman of the Tabernacle, had made them all would have been understood. But the Torah was not content with that approach. Instead, the action word was mentioned time after time to emphasize that what we do is important and worthy of recognition. Each and every action undertaken for the benefit of the community ought to be properly acknowledged.

That is our task in the Jewish world today. As a community we need to publicly recognize the host of volunteers whose actions are important and worthy of our approbation. Tirelessly and without remuneration, men, women and children devote themselves to the betterment of our community and to the service of their fellow Jews and fellow citizens.

In the traditional liturgy, every Shabbat includes a prayer for congregations and communities everywhere who provide for the ritual needs of synagogues as well as for the poor. The prayer expresses the hope that those who are "faithfully involved in the needs of the community" will be protected from harm and absolved from sin.

It is indeed a remarkable prayer because it is so theologically problematic. A tradition that does not recognize forgiveness of sin through the prayers of third parties seems to make an exception for those who are involved in communal affairs. In his commentary to the fifteenth century code of Jewish law, the Tur (Orah Hayyim 284), Rabbi Joseph Karo notes that these charitable causes are stressed and the reward for charitable work exaggerated in order to show the members of the congregation who hear this prayer how great is the reward for those who provide for the needs of others. By publicizing this fact, the aim of the liturgy is to stimulate others to emulate their deeds.

Today, as much as in the past, our community needs to add to the ranks of those who are "faithfully involved in the needs of the community" and at the same time recognize those whose service has enriched us all.

A Salute To Our Community's Volunteers

by Francie Storm, Chair, Department for Human Resources Development, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto

The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto's Department for Human Resources Development is pleased to be part of this community-wide Volunteer Recognition Project to acknowledge the contribution to voluntarism of 59 outstanding individuals from across the Jewish community.

The work of the Department for Human Resources Development focuses on the community's greatest asset: our people. We recruit, place and provide continuing training and recognition to volunteers within the Federation and its family of beneficiary agencies.

There are over 400 organizations in the Jewish community which are supported by several thousand volunteers, the backbone of our community. Without the care, dedication and countless hours of service provided by these volunteers, our organizations could not provide the quality and breadth of service which they are able to provide today.

We are all in the business of making our community a better place to live. The day-to-day work of people helping people cannot be overstated. We, in the Toronto Jewish community, are indeed fortunate - not only do we have organizations which provide programs and facilities to those who require them, but we have special people who are willing and able to give of their time, energy and resources to maintain them!

This Community Recognition is a tribute to 59 individuals who represent their respective organizations for recognition in the community-at-large. They are a shining example of the calibre of individuals who dedicate themselves to their organizations. It is in this spirit, that by honouring these individuals, we also praise the work of all the volunteers in all of the organizations throughout the Jewish community of Greater Toronto. We are truly blessed and take great pride in their marvellous contributions. Kol Hakavod to everyone!

JEWISH FEDERATION OF GREATER TORONTO

הפדרציה היהודית של שרונט רבתי יידישע פעדעראציע פון גרויס טארונטא

At a time in our history when more people have entered the work force, one might imagine that voluntarism would be a thing of the past. While it is true that recruitment of volunteers has become more difficult, the calibre of volunteers and the commitment to their tasks have continued to be exceptional.

The Jewish community of Toronto can boast of having a plethora of institutions that serve the many needs of our diverse Jewish population. However, it can be said, unequivocally, that the health of our organizations is dependent upon the dedication, enthusiasm and commitment of the volunteer sector.

Legions of hard working men, women, children and young adults commit themselves to time-consuming activities that strengthen the causes they support as well as create a strong and vibrant community. By their model of dedication and involvement, they are passing on a Judaic tradition of service to the community that will ensure a richness of Jewish life for future generations.

They are to be saluted for their invaluable contribution to enriching the quality of Jewish life in Toronto and through their untiring efforts ensuring the continuity of our community.

The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and the entire Jewish community thank these very special people, our volunteers, for making a difference. May they be blessed with good health, long life and strength to continue the important work of serving our community.

Message from Michel Dupuy, P.C., M.P.
Minister of Canadian Heritage

It gives me great pleasure to acknowledge the vital presence of Jewish volunteers in the community.

The task of ensuring the well-being of a large community cannot be accomplished without the crucial participation of the many volunteers who devote their time and energy on behalf of their fellow citizens.

Canada's growth and development into one of the most admired countries in the world did not happen by accident. Our success as a nation came about because, from the beginning, we saw the advantage of working together with the thought of the common good as a prime incentive for our labours. Canadians' willingness to contribute their efforts as volunteers in many fields of activity has been a determining factor in our success as a nation.

As Minister of Canadian Heritage, I am proud that my department has been able to assist in promoting voluntarism to the benefit of all Canadians. My thanks to all the volunteers in your community. Please accept my very best wishes for the success of your future endeavours.

Volunteers Receive Them

Sydney Eisen Named 'Sadowski' Winner

Professor Sydney Eisen, this year's most outstanding community leader. The Ben Sadowski Award of Merit, presented by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, is the community's most prestigious service award.

York University History and Humanities Professor Sydney Eisen has received this year's prestigious Ben Sadowski Award of Merit.

Sydney is a former Faculty of Arts Dean at York, who was instrumental in establishing the university's Jewish Studies program, recruiting the first teachers of Judaica and assembling Jewish course offerings.

He also helped found the Centre for Jewish Studies, to develop new areas of teaching and research in cooperation with the community at the Jewish Teachers' Education Program. The program, unique in North America, offers degrees in both Jewish and non-Jewish studies in conjunction with the Board of Jewish Education.

In addition to his York University contributions, Sydney has been active with the Federation, the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Associated Hebrew Schools and the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education.

Leadership Development Award winners Barbara Bank (centre) and David Barkin with Francie Storm, Chair of the Department for Human Resources Development. LD awards were established to encourage the assumption of community leadership by young men and women and are presented each year to those who demonstrate extraordinary community commitment and service.

Leadership Development Awards Presented

BARBARA BANK

Last year's UJA Women's Campaign Chair, Barbara is this year's Co-chair of the UJA Business Cabinet.

Currently National Chair of The March of the Living, Barbara is also involved with Baycrest, the Mount Sinai Women's Auxiliary and United Synagogue Day School. Because of her reputation for hard work and humour, Barbara is among the community's most popular volunteers.

"Each time I volunteer I come away with much more than I have given. I have also learned an invaluable lesson — the work that we do together is holy. It is life-giving and life-building. I have discovered who I am and who I must continue to be."

DAVID BARKIN

David is President of the Jewish Camp Council, Chair of the Federation Leadership Development planning committee and an active UJA canvasser.

He is a Leadership Development graduate who takes on community volunteer tasks with enormous energy, commitment, compassion, honesty and insight.

"Volunteering is my passion. I can't imagine a hobby from which I could derive greater pleasure. I'm particularly excited about Co-chairing Leadership Development as the program's participants represent our future community leadership."

Shem Tov Award Recipients

ROSANNE AIN

Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto

A graduate and past Chair of the Federation's Leadership Development Program, Rosanne is currently Chair of UJA's New Gift Cabinet. She has been involved with the Federation at several levels, the Board of Jewish Education, Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and is a former International Chair of The March of the Living.

ROBERT BERKOVITZ

Reena Foundation

A Reena volunteer since 1986, Robert recently served as the organization's Chairman. He has been a driving force behind Reena's new headquarters, the Toby and Henry Battle Centre in Thornhill. He strongly believes in integrating developmentally-handicapped individuals into the community.

GARRY FOSTER

Jewish Family & Child Service

Garry has just completed a two-year term as President. Faced with the need for fiscal responsibility without service cutbacks, Garry introduced a new strategic plan that will serve as a road map for JF&CS during the next three years.

ELLY GOTZ

Holocaust Remembrance Committee

During his many years of involvement with the Committee, Elly, a Holocaust survivor, has spoken to thousands of students about the Holocaust. Elly helped found the Christian Jewish Dialogue sub-committee which he has co-chaired for a decade.

DAVID GREEN

United Jewish Appeal

David's connection to UJA covers nearly half a century. He is a Chairman of UJA's Golden Givers Program, which honours contributors with at least a 25 year history of giftgiving. He is an award-winning fundraiser who has collected hundreds of thousands of dollars for the community.

AARON LANDAU

Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living

Aaron has provided more than a decade of service to the Centre. He served on several committees before becoming President and then Chairman. Aaron also volunteers for Holy Blossom Temple, the Casa Loma Historical Committee and the Inner City Angels. He is a recipient of a City of Toronto Community Service medal.

BEVERLY LYONS

Jewish Vocational Service

Beverly is Immediate Past President with a 15 year history at the agency. Her other volunteer activities include Chair, Federation's Commission on Jewish Education, Alzheimer's Foundation, Kidney Foundation and Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

DR. MARVIN NASH

Jewish Camp Council of Toronto

A board member since 1968, Marvin is an active Past President in Council affairs. His presidency coincided with a difficult financial period which he helped overcome. Every summer, Marvin is available to load camp buses and calm frightened first-time campers. He also volunteers for the Ontario Association of Optometrists.

59 VOLUNTEERS WHO MAKE A DIFFERENCE IN OUR COMMUNITY

Volunteers are our community's front line service providers. They play a key role in shaping the future of a dynamic community of excellence. Our society simply cannot afford to pay for all the important functions that we depend on volunteers to perform. Without our volunteers, many services would not be provided and our quality of life would be compromised.

These men and women represent the spirit of voluntarism across the broad spectrum of our Jewish community; volunteers who engage in their work directly — people to people. Individually they are the builders and shapers of our future but their collective spirit is integral to the success and productivity of quality Jewish life.

Their personal expressions of commitment to Klal Yisrael are translated into action through their volunteer involvement in our community organizations. Meet 59 volunteers who are making a difference...

Gloria Clamen,
Chair, Volunteer Recognition Project

1 • Adath Israel Congregation

Herman Gottesman

"Every Jew has the responsibility and obligation to volunteer and support Jewish causes in the community not just for him/herself, but for the children, grandchildren and the generations to come."

2 • Aish HaTorah

Harold Nashman

"I believe in Aish HaTorah's commitment to Jewish continuity. It is rewarding that one's role in an organization can actually make a difference. The Rabbis and staff are a great source of inspiration and motivation for all the volunteers."

3 • All For One Mutual Benefit Society

Irving Soloway

"Our diminishing membership has not destroyed the will to serve our members and the Jewish community here and in Israel through voluntarism, our dedicated resource."

4 • Alpha Omega Dental Fraternity

Dr. Ira Marder

"My spirit of voluntarism is due to having benefited from the Toronto Jewish educational system, its Torah values, and especially from my home upbringing. These instilled in me the ideals of contributing of one's self and one's own to others."

5 • Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto

Louis Greenbaum

"To me, Tzedakah is much more than giving money. Voluntarism is part of Tzedakah. My involvements represent a personal commitment to promote Jewish education, Jewish continuity, and communal organizations here and in Israel."

6 • Bathurst Jewish Centre

Sadie Sobel

"I love dealing with people. I would continue to run the seniors' lounge everyday even if there was no volunteer recognition."

7 • Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care

Lou Stillman

"Volunteering is one of the few areas where the return surpasses the investment - the satisfaction, warmth, gratification received makes it time well spent. Baycrest has a diversification of areas to choose from, and I like the variety."

8 • Beit Halochem Canada

Berny Weinstein

"I have been involved with Beit Halochem since 1975. Our paramount objective is helping Israel's disabled war veterans resume normal life quickly, giving them the necessary assistance for their physical and emotional rehabilitation. I have been rewarded tenfold for my efforts."

9 • The Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living

David Magil

"I believe it is important for everyone to give something back to the community. It is educative and gratifying to work with other volunteers and professionals to enrich the lives of others."

10 • Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation

Kurt Schiller

"I am a Holocaust survivor and because of the way I was brought up, now that I am able to help others, I feel the responsibility to do so. I do volunteer work to make up for the time I was unable to help others."

11 • Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue

Ralph Snow

"In the eventide of my life, I believe even more that we must give of ourselves and our possessions for the privilege of staying alive."

12 • Beth Tikvah Synagogue

Arnold Borts

"While my present community involvement is mainly with Beth Tikvah Synagogue, any voluntarism is most rewarding. On a personal level, it enhances the quality of my own life in helping others."

13 • Beth Tzedec Congregation

Judy Feld Carr

"As a synagogue leader and activist in the cause of Syrian Jewry, I believe that synagogue is the unique, basic organism that perpetuates and strengthens peoplehood. Synagogue is an integral part of the broader community represented by the concept of Federation."

14 • Bialik Hebrew Day School

Melanie Nathanson

"My dedication to voluntarism stems from my love for Bialik Hebrew Day School. I needed to give back to the school what they have given to my two sons Craig and Daryl in both education and love for Israel."

15 • Bloor Jewish Community Centre

Karen Chisvin

"In over 12 years of committee participation at Bloor JCC, I have been privileged to be a part of an agency dedicated to service in a resurgent Jewish community, and to be part of its reconstruction for the future."

16 • B'nai Brith Women of Toronto

Anna Bloom

"'People Helping People' is an important principle in my life. Through my involvement with B'nai Brith Women, I am able to help women and children both here and in Israel."

17 • B'nai Brith Youth Organization

Brian Baumal

"Volunteering with BBYO maintains my Jewish community involvement. One of the program's goals is to develop Jewish teen leadership. Providing leadership training and a sense of Jewish identity to teens is challenging, but seeing teens develop and applying this training is personally rewarding."

18 • Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University

Dr. Leona Finkler

"As survivors, my husband Arnold and I dedicated ourselves to Israel and humanity. Our special interest, Bar-Ilan University, is in the forefront of preservation of Jewish values, identity and continuity."

19 • Canadian Friends of Bikur Cholim Hospital in Jerusalem

Leah Aryeh

"When I first visited Bikur Cholim Hospital in Jerusalem, I was struck by its desperate need for expansion and modernization. I am grateful that I was afforded the opportunity to help it towards that goal."

20 • Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University

Dr. Ralph Halbert

"Voluntarism is part of our Jewish heritage - a value system embracing Tzedakah and other mitzvot; therefore, a segment of one's life. The Hebrew University of Jerusalem is a premier research and teaching institution and has made a significant impact on its society."

21 • Canadian Friends of Peace Now

Beverley Stern

"Joining Peace Now in this community, you have to have a lot of fortitude - or be crazy - or both. But because I identify closely with Peace Now's goals and values, this is where I feel most comfortable."

22 • Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University

Ralph Snow

"In my unwavering support for the beloved State of Israel, I strongly believe that excellent, comprehensive higher education is Israel's strongest national asset to carry her forward into the future. Am Yisrael Chai."

23 • The Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science

Dr. Allan & Carol Gordon

"What has impressed us about Weizmann is the quality, vision and achievement of its people: researchers, educators, innovators, administrators in Israel, and in Canada, the equally accomplished scientists, professionals, business people and academics who number among the supporters of the Canadian Society."

24 • Canadian Society for Yad Vashem

Miriam Gelbloom

"My community involvement has been most satisfying and rewarding. I feel that a commitment to Yad Vashem is a moral obligation to 'Klal Yisrael.' By teaching the Holocaust to our youth, we can eliminate indifference, and inspire them to be proactive."

25 • Canadian Technion Society

Sydney C. Cooper

"It is essential to support the community and Israel to the greatest extent. It is vital to support Technion - Israel Institute of Technology. Its graduates, engineers, scientists, business managers and leaders in research, defence and government are key to Israel's secure continuity."

26 • Chenstochover Aid Society

Phil Skovronek

"Thanks to the Jewish institutions that gave me the opportunity to do volunteer work for my brethren in Israel and Toronto. This work has filled a void in my heart after the Holocaust."

27 • Downtown Jewish Community School

Cheryl Wetstein

"Volunteering at the DJCS has given me a greater sense of community, has allowed me to contribute to my children's Jewish education and to meet some truly wonderful people."

28 • [illegible] Academy/ [illegible] Hebrew Day School

Ellen Kessler

"Working with a child is like planting a seed - when you put in the energy, wow, what beautiful growth! And I'm learning a basic law of the universe - when you truly give, you truly get. So, it's really very selfish of me!"

29 • Emunah Women of Toronto

Elaine Genesove

"By volunteering, I share the role of helping disadvantaged children and new immigrants in Israel. This enriches my life, thinking beyond personal needs. It also teaches my children the meaning of 'Chesed' and 'Tzedakah'."

30 • Hadassah-WIZO, Toronto

Patricia (Pat) Alpert

"As Jews, it is imperative for our survival as a people and for the survival of Israel that we participate in the Jewish community. Hadassah-WIZO's mandate fulfills this responsibility."

31 • Jewish Camp Council of Toronto

Steven Silver

"My father has been an active volunteer throughout his life, and he taught me the need to give something back to the community. I also find that it makes me feel good."

32 • Jewish Family and Child Service

Jean Goldstein

"Volunteering is a continuous learning experience. I gain as much out of it as I give, or perhaps more. And there is no finer place to learn and contribute than Jewish Family & Child Service."

33 • Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada (Toronto)

Sydney Blinick

"The pleasure and satisfaction of associating with JIAS over 15 years can only be exceeded by feelings of hope, freedom, security and opportunity enjoyed by more than 140,000 of our Jewish 'family' brought to this wonderful land through the efforts of JIAS."

34 • Jewish National Fund of Toronto

Patricia (Pat) Alpert

"I take pride in my involvement with the JNF, which has been primarily responsible for developing the 'land' of Israel for 93 years. Personal feelings of self-fulfillment and seeing the accomplishments of JNF have provided ongoing impetus for my volunteer activity."

35 • Jewish Student Federation of York University

Dena Libman

"My volunteer work at the Jewish Student Federation has allowed me to give back to the community and is preparing me to be a leader in the Jewish community in the future."

36 • Jewish Vocational Service of Metropolitan Toronto

Elaine Zimmerman

"JVS provides people with the tools they need to enhance the quality of their work lives. My quality of life is enhanced by being a part of this team."

37 • Jewish Women's Federation

Agi Mandel

"Improving our world through voluntarism in organizations such as JWF and UJA empowers collectively against the impersonal and unjust fates of world events or circumstance; to make the difference in individual lives is a personal expression of my Jewishness."

38 • Judean Benevolent and Friendly Society

Robert (Bob) Weiss

"After settling in Canada and establishing a family business, I turned my attention and devotion to all the possible Jewish activities that I am capable of and hope to ensure the future of the Jewish community in Toronto and in Medinot, Israel."

39 • Kehillat Shaarei Torah of Toronto

Flo Urbach

"I enjoy working for my shul as I find it very rewarding to watch it grow and prosper and thus strengthen the Jewish presence in my neighbourhood."

40 • Mizrachi Organization of Canada

Max Zeifman

"To volunteer time and effort to a Jewish cause is an important mitzvah. I was brought up in the Mizrachi tradition that religious Zionism and volunteering is another way of passing on the tradition to my family and friends."

41 • Mount Sinai Hospital

Honours All Its Volunteers

"From our beginning as a 33-bed maternity and convalescent hospital founded in 1923 by the Ezras Noshem Society, volunteers have played an integral role in our hospital. Volunteers continue to be a vital part of our team."

42 • National Council of Jewish Women of Canada (Toronto Section)

Gita Arnold

"In the 31 years I have spent as a volunteer in a community organization, I can honestly admit that I have gained at least as much as I have given."

43 • Netivot HaTorah Day School

Shauna Tepperman

"I believe in Netivot HaTorah Day School and its educational goals. As a volunteer, I've had the privilege to contribute to Netivot's growth. In turn, the experience has enriched my life."

44 • New Israel Fund of Canada

Sharon Weintraub

"NIF has re-energized my commitment to Israel because its dedication to equity, pluralism advocacy and voluntarism reflect my values. NIF's work improves the quality of life for all Israeli citizens."

45 • Or Haemet Sephardic School

Maurice Benzacar

"I committed to plant the seed of Sephardism with its full glory in Canada. Being a small community, voluntarism takes on a greater dimension. The fulfillment of seeing our children grow as true Sephardic Jews makes every effort worth it."

46 • Pomegranate Guild of Judaic Textiles, Toronto

Sarah Silver

"My guild offers me an opportunity to share my creative gifts with others and participate in the making of fabric wall hangings for Baycrest Hospital, our gift to the community."

47 • Reena Foundation

"I believe in helping people to help themselves. That's what attracted me to Toronto Hebrew Free Loan (G'Milath Chasodim) and to Jewish Immigrant Aid Services. I love synagogue life - there's no business like shul business and the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism."

59 • Wierzbniker Friendly Mutual Benefit Society

Abe Zukerman

"My reason for volunteering over the past number of years is that having lost all my family during the Holocaust, I felt it my duty to see a strong State of Israel and a healthy and vibrant Jewish generation to carry on."

Accessing Meaningful Volunteer Opportunities

by Terri Weinstraub, Chair, Volunteer Development, Department for Human Resources Development, Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto

Yes, YOU can get involved! Are you...

- ☐ a professional who would like to share your expertise on a community board of directors?
- ☐ a student who would like to get more involved in your community?
- ☐ a retired person who has extra time on your hands?
- ☐ new to our community and would like to meet people?
- ☐ none of the above...but you don't know how or where to begin?

WE CAN HELP YOU FIND A PLACE AS A VOLUNTEER.

The Volunteer Development Committee of the Federation supplements the activity of beneficiary agencies and organizations in the area of volunteer recruitment. We like to think of ourselves as a "shopping basket" of volunteer opportunities providing information on volunteering and serving as a central resource for volunteer referrals and placement.

Persons interested in becoming a volunteer, whether or not they have previous volunteer experience, can attend a personal interview to explore the best possible opportunities based on their skills, interests and time availability. A wide range of opportunities are kept on file for policy-making volunteers, committee members and direct service volunteers. We make the referrals to the appropriate agencies or community organizations.

Each year, hundreds of new volunteers enter the volunteer arena or are redirected to new volunteer experiences. You can be one of them. We're here for you...call us today at (416) 635-2883 ext. 137!

Common Goal Links Volunteer Coordinators

by Arnold Foss, Supervisor, Volunteer Program and Development, Senior Care/Community Services to the Jewish Elderly

Volunteer education, program development, effective sharing of resources, professional development and peer support are just a few of the opportunities provided through the Volunteer Coordinators Forum, facilitated by the Department for Human Resources Development of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

The Forum offers a venue for the professional staff of affiliate agencies responsible for volunteer management to dialogue and better understand each other's volunteer needs.

Working together has made it possible to organize community-wide volunteer educational events as well as opportunities for staff enrichment. Workshops have been presented on motivating volunteers, volunteer recognition, volunteer recruitment and volunteer/staff relations.

The varied experience and expertise of the Forum's membership has contributed to creative brainstorming and ideas exchange. Members share information on their agency's activities, which has resulted in joint ventures and avoiding duplication of services. The agencies have developed a closer, more positive working relationship.

Volunteering at a Community Agency

"I wanted to make a meaningful commitment and this was a good way to do it," says Lonnie Kirsh. Lonnie has been a Big Brother to a young boy for about 3 years. Once a week, they get together to go bike riding, play hockey or baseball or visit museums. All it takes is a few hours each week to make a difference in the life of a child. Being a Big Brother or Big Sister is about sharing and caring and being a friend.

BIG BROTHERS AND SISTERS come from a wide range of backgrounds and serve as role models and special friends for children who don't always get the attention and guidance they need.

CJC election bylaws under review

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Herbert Marx, a Quebec Superior Court judge and former provincial justice minister, has agreed to head a Canadian Jewish Congress commission charged with reviewing the organization's bylaws.

The goal is to avoid the "abuse of the system" that marred the elections at the last plenary assembly in May in Montreal, said Congress president Goldie Hershon.

Hershon said the commission will be examining in particular the rules governing election of officers and registration of delegates to the triennial plenary assemblies.

Hershon promised to set up such a task force at the plenary in May, where she defeated Thomas Hecht by 16 votes. The credentials of some delegates were impossible to verify under the current system.

Hershon said she does not expect the commission to review what happened at the last plenary. "I think we have to go forward and tighten up the bylaws."

The bylaws, she noted, worked for 76 years because there was "an honor system ... they were never abused before."

She is convinced that the deadline for delegate registration will have to be well in advance of the plenary. (Organizational delegates were permitted to register up to and including the first day of the plenary. Delegates-at-large had been elected – or, for the most part, acclaimed – a month before.)

She also believes what constitutes a Jewish organization will have to be clarified, perhaps by drawing up a list of groups eligible to send delegates.

Herbert Marx

Who will sit on the commission and how it will proceed have not yet been decided. Basically, it is expected to make its report to the national officers within 18 months, and, if adopted, the report will be ratified by the national council, a body composed of everyone who was a delegate at the last plenary. Marx and Hershon are to meet next month to discuss these details.

Marx said he had not yet received any terms of reference from Congress. "Nothing has been spelled out ... I'm just pleased to be able to serve the community."

Marx holds no formal position with Congress.

Hershon said the commission will likely invite "those involved with [this last election]" to make themselves heard. "But we can't have hundreds of people coming forward," she said. Submissions or presentations will not be made public, she added.

Olmert wants talks to begin on Jerusalem's final status

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The mayor of Jerusalem, Ehud Olmert, has called on the Israeli government to begin final status negotiations on the city now.

According to the 1993 Oslo accords, Israel is scheduled to enter into such talks with the PLO in May 1996. But in an interview here last week, Olmert said, "I'd rather do it now than later."

Olmert, a former Likud cabinet minister who is none too pleased with the Oslo peace process, claimed that Israel's "bargaining position" will be weakened if it abides by the Oslo timetable.

At the final stage of negotiations, he said, the Arabs will have greater power to pressure Israel to compromise on Jerusalem. So it is in Israel's interest to discuss the issue sooner rather than later.

In principle, Olmert opposes talks on Jerusalem. "I'm against any concessions and compromises, and the sooner we spell it out clearly to the Arabs, the better off we'll be."

Calling the government's recent suspension of land expropriations around Jerusalem a mistake, Olmert said the city requires more space to cope with an expanding population. Asked to be specific, he replied: "How much land I don't know. But we'll definitely need it."

By the end of the century, he noted, Jerusalem will be home to about 600,000 Jews and 190,000 Palestinian Arabs.

Olmert said Palestinian housing requirements will be met with the construction of 12,180 units for over 60,000 Arabs.

He scoffed at recent remarks by his predecessor, Teddy Kollek, that the suspended expropriations had been poorly timed. "If Kollek had been mayor now, he would have said the opposite."

And Olmert criticized the Likud for having joined forces with a coalition of Israeli Arab parties in the Knesset in a bid to unseat the government. "It was a mistake, even for the right reason."

CANADA

Abella to Head Commitee

TORONTO — Former Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) president Irving Abella has succeeded Milton Harris as head of CJC's war crimes committee.

Harris, who headed the committee for 12 years, will remain a member.

Abella's appointment was announced by newly-installed CJC president Goldie Hershon.

Abella called on government officials to move forward on all their files involving alleged Nazi war criminals.

War Criminal Departs

TORONTO — Konrads Kalejs, a wartime member of a notorious Latvian killing squad, has left Canada for Australia, where he is a citizen.

Kalejs departed last Wednesday, hours before his visitor's status elapsed, said Immigration Canada spokesman Roger White. Kalejs was to have faced a deportation hearing on Aug. 4.

Kalejs' departure has cancelled the inquiry, White said, adding that his name will now go on a watch list as someone who is inadmissible to Canada.

In 1993, Kalejs was deported from the United States because of his involvement as an officer in the Arajs Kommando, a unit that murdered tens of thousands of Latvian Jews, Gypsies and communists.

ISRAEL

Rabbi Yisraeli Dies

JERUSALEM — Rabbi Shaul Yisraeli, one of Israel's leading Zionist thinkers, died here last Friday. He was 85.

Rabbi Yisraeli was known for his rulings on security and settlement issues. He wrote several books, winning the prestigious Israel Prize in 1990 for his contribution to Jewish thought.

He was head of the Merkaz HaRav Yeshivah as well as spiritual leader of Gush Emunim, the national-religious settlement movement.

Earlier this year, Rabbi Yisraeli teamed up with other sages to issue a halachic edict requiring soldiers to disobey orders to evacuate any parts of territories Israel seized after the Six Day War.

Tight Race: Poll

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu would receive 39 and 38 per cent of the vote, respectively, if elections had been held last week, a poll showed.

The poll also found that the Labor Party would receive 36 Knesset seats; Likud 34; Meretz 8; Tsomet 7; former foreign minister's David Levy's yet-unnamed party 5; the Third Way 3 or 4; Natan Sharansky's new immigrants' party 3; and Hadash 3.

Beilin Seeking Funds

JERUSALEM — Deputy Foreign Minister Yossi Beilin has been quietly sounding out several European countries and Japan about offering economic assistance to Syria after it reaches a peace accord with Israel, a senior ministry official told The Jerusalem Post last week.

Among the possibilities being raised is the rescheduling of "a few billion dollars in loans" owed by Syria, the official said.

Disapora Falls Short

JERUSALEM — The Diaspora has contributed only about one-tenth of the money needed to absorb new immigrants, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin told the Zionist General Council last week.

"Israel has spent $3 billion [to] $4 billion on immigrant absorption," Rabin said. "The contribution of world Jewry has amounted to about 10 per cent of that. It is the average Israeli citizen that is carrying the burden."

Jewish Fertility Rate

JERUSALEM — At the beginning of 1994, Israel's population numbered 5.3 million — 81.5 per cent Jews, 14.1 per cent Muslims, 2.7 per cent Christians and 1.7 per cent Druze and others, according to government figures released last week.

In 1993, the Jewish fertility rate (the number of children women are expected to have in their lifetime) was 2.61. For Muslims it was 4.68, Christians 2.03 and Druze and others 3.76.

Immigration from the former Soviet Union, where families are generally smaller, drove down the Jewish fertility rate, the report said.

Life expectancy in 1993 was 75 years for men and 78.5 years for women, the report said.

Palestinian Denials

JERUSALEM — PLO leader Yasser Arafat ordered that $10 million be allocated to Israeli Arab parties and municipalities to form a lobby for the establishment of a Palestinian state, according to documents obtained last week by The Jerusalem Post.

But Palestinian officials declared the documents a forgery obtained and distributed by right-wing Israeli circles to embarrass the Palestinian Authority.

Road Unveiled

JERUSALEM — Jewish settlement activists unveiled a seven-kilometre dirt road last Monday that was secretly built over the last four months, linking a number of settlements in the Judean Desert.

Settler groups said the road is just one of several being constructed clandestinely in the territories to form blocs of settlements.

The road cost 250,000 shekels to build, with most of that coming from contributions here and abroad.

Report Denied

JERUSALEM — Israeli officials have denied a newspaper report that they had reached a secret, preliminary agreement with Syria that calls for a gradual withdrawal from all of the Golan Heights.

The prime minister's office and the foreign ministry said last Tuesday there was no truth to a report in the French weekly Tribune Juive that said Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, while in Paris earlier this month, signed a draft agreement on a staged withdrawal from the Golan over the next 10 years.

BGU's Canadian Chairs

BEERSHEVA — Ben-Gurion University of the Negev recently inaugurated two academic chairs with Canadian connections.

The Dr. Morrie M. Gelfand Chair in Obstetrics and Gynecology will support research into pregnancy-related disease. It was established by BGU's Canadian Associates along with the Montreal doctor's friends and family.

The David and Dorothy Schwartzman Chair in Community Development was endowed at the university's School of Social Work by 99-year-old Dorothy Schwartzman of Vancouver in her name and that of her late husband.

A Georgian Embassy

JERUSALEM — The former Soviet republic of Georgia will open an embassy in Jerusalem, according to the country's president, Eduard Shevardnadze.

He made the announcement last Monday at Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin's office, where the two signed a cooperation agreement covering culture, communications and agriculture.

WORLD

Aussie Leader Dies

SYDNEY — Syd Einfeld, credited with changing Australia's immigration policy to provide a refuge for Holocaust survivors, died here last Friday, one day before his 86th birthday.

Einfeld served in both the federal and state parliaments, representing the Australian Labor Party. He also served four terms as president of the Executive Council of Australian Jewry and 10 years as president of the Federation of Australian Jewish Welfare Societies.

Baycrest, Senior Care to merge services

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and Senior Care (Community Services to Jewish Elderly) have announced their intention to merge.

The two organizations are the primary providers of care to Toronto's Jewish elderly.

The plan was approved at the Baycrest Centre's annual meeting last week, and Senior Care is expected to follow suit at its annual meeting later this month.

Michael Scheinert, executive director of Senior Care, and Moshe Greengarten, vice-president of public and community affairs for Baycrest, spoke to The CJN at the Senior Care offices.

The intention of the merger, they said, is to provide an efficient continuum of care to the Jewish aged in the city and to their families, "to maximize independence and enrich quality of life," said Scheinert.

It is important to stress that there will be no reduction in services, Greengarten said. At first, clients and their families will not notice any change. There will be the same staff, volunteers and procedures.

"It will be a seamless change," Scheinert said.

The merge will take advantage of the different backgrounds, experiences and strengths of each organization, he added.

Senior Care services focus on maintaining the elderly in their homes, offering such assistance as housekeeping, personal care, kosher meals on wheels, intergenerational and escort programs, counselling and transportation.

While Baycrest has concentrated on institutional care, its services also include in-home assessments, medical treatment, a community centre, a day care program and chronic care. Affiliated with the University of Toronto, it is also active in research and education.

Both offer respite care, Senior Care in the person's home, Baycrest in its facilities.

The merger will make it easier for people to pass from one level of service and care to the next — or back again, as their health and circumstances permit. Someone may go from a few hours of housekeeping care to day care to the Home for Aged, for instance — or from rehabilitation in the Baycrest Hospital to meals on wheels at home and a few hours of housekeeping.

The move reflects efforts in the health care field generally to best harness shrinking fiscal resources, by the formation of "strategic alliances," as hospitals and community agencies join larger organizations, but Scheinert said this was not the main reason for it.

"We have a common goal," he said. "The challenge over the next few years will be to preserve what we have and find better ways to do what we are doing."

The first step, Greengarten said, once approval is granted by the boards, will be to have representation on each other's boards.

Two task forces will be struck, composed of representatives from both boards and the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, one to determine the best governance structure for the new organization, the other to examine the coordination of operations, "to maximize the potential from the capacities of both," Greengarten said.

"You won't find such a comprehensive, integrated system of geriatric care anywhere," said Scheinert. "It will be a first."

This becomes significant, Greengarten pointed out, when one considers that the Jewish community has far more elderly than the general community, a trend which will grow over the next few years.

"The Jewish community has to respond sooner — we have to find answers to challenges they won't be dealing with for 20 years."

Cautious optimism over Network budget changes

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Recent budget and organizational changes to Network Canada have elicited "cautious optimism" about the future of the student activist organization from its executive director Howard Katz.

The changes became effective at the meeting of the Council of Jewish Federations Canada (CJFC), held recently in Montreal.

Under the new plan, Network, which is funded by the CJFC with money collected by United Jewish Appeal, will receive $67,000 in operating expenses for the coming year.

The cut appears to represent a 33 per cent reduction in Network's former annual budget of just over $100,000. Early discussions indicated a potential budget cut of up to 50 per cent, and student members feared that Network would cease to exist.

In fact, the organization is being given more money, says Ted Medzon, chair of the CJFC campus services committee which made the recommendations.

Up to $50,000 may be made available from a reserve fund to pay Network's outstanding debts and the balance of Network's former budget is being redirected to local communities to allow students to attend Network conferences in other cities. In the past, Network itself has funded students.

In a further cost-cutting move, the Network office on Bathurst Street will close and the organization will share space in the office headed by Zac Kaye, director of central campus services in Toronto.

Congress leader Lenkinski remembered

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — He was a fixture at Canadian Jewish Congress meetings, often rising from his chair to address the issues of the day, speaking eloquently in his Yiddish-tinged accent, and framing his well-conceived arguments in the perspective developed over years of struggling for social justice.

A self-taught man whose education was cut short in his native Poland, Louis Lenkinski was remembered as someone who spoke his mind on a broad range of issues but who respected the views of others.

Lenkinski was struck down suddenly last week by a heart attack at the age of 74.

With his passing came an avalanche of testimonials from friends and colleagues.

Rabbi Dow Marmur, who delivered the funeral eulogy, recalled Lenkinski as a man who "did not crave for honors or public recognition, but accepted that the only reward worth having for performing a mitzvah is — performing the mitzvah. That's why we loved him whether or not we agreed with him.

"It did not take very long for people around him to appreciate that rare combination of brilliance and humanity, intelligence and care, passion for justice and concern for individuals which made Louis not only a competent professional but, above all, a mentsh," Rabbi Marmur said.

Speaking at his funeral, Ontario Premier Bob Rae recalled Lenkinski as "a man of great commitment, of great engagement: he knew which side he was on and he knew who he could trust to be with him and he was not afraid of anyone or anything ... He had a wonderful sense of fun and there was no one better to have at one's side in the trenches."

Lenkinski's son, Bob, who lives in Philadelphia, remembered his father as "a tough guy who was tender. You always knew where he stood, but he was not a fanatic. He always left room for disagreement. He was a man you could respect. He was never too tired to fight for what he believed in.

Louis Lenkinski

"Growing up, I always remember him with a book in his hand. He had a passion for public affairs. He was intellectually aggressive and he challenged himself all the time. That has stayed with me."

[Lenkinski] was "an articulate advocate who had an opinion on almost everything," said Moshe Ronen, chair of Congress' Ontario region. "Although he came from the ideological left, he had the respect of the ideological right because his criticism always had a constructive aspect."

"Louis was an integral part of the Congress family," said Congress president Goldie Hershon.

"Whenever he spoke it was from the heart and with commitment and fervor. His presence at the national officers and executive tables will be missed."

Lenkinski grew up in the Polish city of Lodz and was a democratic socialist and a member of the Bund from an early age. During the war, he was trapped in the Lodz ghetto. Later, he was transferred to the Czestochowa labor camp. Both his parents and a younger brother died during the war.

After liberation, Lenkinski remained active with the Bund and in 1950, Louis, his wife Helen and Bob immigrated to Toronto to join Louis' brother Yanek.

An activist to the core, Lenkinski eventually became a business agent for the upholsterers' union where he worked and later served as executive assistant of the Ontario Federation of Labor.

A longstanding officer of Congress' Ontario region, Lenkinski held many executive positions.

In recent years, he also served as a director of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, where he held a number of positions.

At the time of his death, he was vice-chair of the Ontario Human Rights Commission. He was a founder and chair of the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation.

He is survived by his wife, Helen, sons Bob and Lionel, daughters-in-law Yael and Judith, and grandchildren Libby, Ori, Lee and Lizabeth.

A deep commitment to Jewish community

Eulogy for Louis Lenkinski
By MANUEL PRUTSCHI
Executive director
CJC Ontario region.

It is with profound sadness that the officers, the executive and the entire staff of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), mourn the passing of our beloved Louis Lenkinski.

Louis was a personal friend to so many of us. His loss leaves an empty spot in our hearts. So many intellectual discussions, on every topic under the sun, need now be left unfinished.

Louis was an outstanding community leader. His passing leaves an irreparable tear in the fabric of Canadian Jewish Congress, an organization with which he was so integrally involved. We will miss his wisdom, his point-blank analysis, and the differences of opinion, differences argued over passionately, but always with reason.

Ontario and Canada will be the poorer in a world without Louis. Like Hillel, Louis believed that "If I am not for myself, who is for me?" That is why he had a deep love for and a commitment to the Jewish community and Israel. But also like Hillel, he held that "If I care only for myself, what am I?" That is why Louis often spoke of "human solidarity" — one of his favorite phrases and a concept he lived by. He passionately cared for the plight of others whose rights were under attack or who were in need.

Louis was an example to all of us in the way he led his life, and in his service to community. May his memory, and the tangible record of his deeds, forever be a source of comfort to all of us.

Mazon spring allocation jumps by 33 per cent

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mazon's biannual allocations to food banks and social welfare organizations keep on growing.

Last week the group, which bills itself as a Jewish response to hunger, announced it was distributing $84,600 to 72 grassroots anti-hunger organizations across the country. The spring allocation was the largest ever made by Mazon and it marks a 33 per cent jump over the same period last year.

With each allocation eclipsing previous records and with the fall round yet to come, Mazon can expect to exceed last year's record contribution of $143,750. Altogether it has distributed $712,000 over its nine-year history.

The largest single allocation of $4,000 in the spring 1995 round went to Tomchai Shabbos of Toronto. Tomchai Shabbos' Montreal counterpart received $3,000. Other recipients included Manna Verdun Food Bank ($1,000), L'Chaim Centre for Adult Day Care in Vancouver ($1,000), the Lethbridge Food Bank ($500), the Saskatoon Food Bank ($1,000), the Twelve Basket Food Bank, Middleton, N.S. ($1,000) and B'nai Brith Hillel, Montreal ($2,500).

In other developments, Mazon announced that after a sabbatical in Israel, Rabbi Chaim Sacknovitch has rejoined the organization's board. Tammy Anklewicz and Liz Wolfe are new additions to the board.

Mazon allocates funds donated by individuals and synagogues to a variety of Jewish and non-Jewish organizations that tackle the problem of hunger in Canadian society.

Funds are raised through a variety of means, with individuals celebrating simchas being asked to donate a percentage of their food costs. Mazon also raises money by offering special occasion place cards.

B'nai Brith's Marcus to join Federation

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Paul Marcus, 33, national director of the Institute for International Affairs, an agency of B'nai Brith Canada, will leave the organization in late July to join the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto in a senior fundraising position.

Marcus, a lawyer by profession, will take on his new role August 8 and will report to Alan Reitzes, executive director of the federation. The newly created position will involve capital fundraising development.

"The federation plays a key role in preserving and enriching Jewish life," Marcus told The CJN, adding that he is very pleased to continue working in the Jewish community.

The Institute for International Affairs, which Marcus has directed for the past six years, has a mandate to protest the abuse of human rights worldwide, promote human rights education and advocate on behalf of Jewish communities.

"It's been a very exciting time to work in the international arena. I've had a tremendous experience at B'nai Brith," he said.

His work has taken him to places like Geneva, Switzerland, where he was a delegate to the United Nations Commission on Human Rights in 1994, and Hungary, where he interviewed government officials for a study on right-wing extremism in Europe and North America.

Fundraising

His comments on international issues have been featured on national television news broadcasts and in most major newspapers in Canada.

A graduate of the University of Toronto, where he studied political science, and Queen's University, where he attended law school, Marcus also studied for one year at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

In a volunteer capacity, he is vice-chair of the committee on race and ethnocultural equity of the Town of Markham.

Racism in military probed

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The armed forces should screen potential soldiers for racist views, Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada told the public inquiry into the deployment of Canadian Forces to Somalia in separate submissions last week.

The inquiry is looking at the training, leadership and deployment of the Airborne Regiment that was sent to Somalia in 1992-93.

Canadian Jewish Congress suggested that screening soldiers for peace keeping duties would prevent a recurrence of the incidents that occurred in Somalia.

Bernie Farber, national director of community relations for Congress also told the commission that the military should be open with the public about measures it takes against soldiers or officers who engage in racist activities.

"If we are to have a level of confidence that these issues will be addressed, we need to know what action has been taken," Farber said.

The Congress delegation also commended the armed forces for adopting a policy in 1994 to deal with racist conduct. However, Hal Joffe, Congress national chair of community relations, said the policy would be stronger if it specified the consequences of various racist activities, such as membership in a white supremacist group. Consequences are inconsistent across the country because the policy grants wide discretion to commanding officers, Joffe said.

"We would like to see more teeth put into the policy to make sure that it is consistent and transparent," he said.

He added that officers should be trained to evaluate the relative seriousness of certain activities.

"There should be some form of structure so a commander would know how seriously to regard a member who has attended a meeting of the Aryan Nations," he said.

Psychological testing suggested

B'nai Brith recommended that overt racism or membership in a racist group should disqualify someone from joining the military. Similarly, a willingness to apply human rights principles might be a factor in promotions.

Karen Mock, national director for B'nai Brith, suggested that applicants to the military should undergo psychological testing to determine their attitudes.

Marvin Kurz, legal counsel for B'nai Brith said there is evidence that white supremacist groups encourage members to join the military because it provides excellent training in combat skills. And military culture, which is strictly hierarchical and based on discipline and allegiance to authority, is similar to the culture of hate groups.

While most soldiers do not identify with racist groups, he said, "We know that every hard-core adherent to hate groups sees himself as a soldier."

Mock stressed the need for human rights and cross-cultural training at all levels of the military.

Training should relate to all tasks performed by the military, she said, and should be done in a way that enhances the esprit de corps that is so important to military groups.

services committee, is considered a leading professional on the campus scene. He is torn between his support for the concept of student "ownership," which distinguishes Network from Hillel-type groups, and the financial constraints affecting all organizations.

Shai Spetgang, Network's central region chair, believes that grassroots organizations and their professionally run counterparts can "bring out the best in each other."

The money allocated to Network is earmarked for four conventions (one national and three regional) and the production of its student magazine Future Tense.

Medzon wants to make it clear, however, that Network is just part of the picture. Concerns about Jewish continuity have brought campus issues to the forefront. "The campus services committee is concerned with all students, not just those who are active," he said.

Sobolewski fights payments to Polish war criminals

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Roman Catholic survivor of Auschwitz is hoping to convince Poland's minister of justice to prevent payment of damages as compensation to two Poles who spent time in jail for the wartime murder of Jews.

Sigmund Sobolewski told The CJN he is offended by recent Polish court decisions that annulled the convictions of three Poles who were part of a unit that rounded up and murdered 12 Jews in May 1944. Their convictions were overturned by a Polish court because of their "activities to secure the independence of the Polish state," Sobolewski said.

One of the Poles later claimed damages for a five-year sentence that was imposed in 1952. A court in the city of Olsztyn awarded him 308 million Polish zlotys, 60 months salary for a skilled worker, Sobolewski said, "or an equivalent of 25 million zlotys for every Jew killed."

Sobolewski, who learned of the case from a front page story in a Polish weekly newspaper, said two others involved in the murders recently applied for the same compensation. Their case has been adjourned until July 15.

Sigmund Sobolewski

Sobolewski, vice-president of the Auschwitz Awareness Society, said he had written to Poland's justice minister Jerzy Jaskiernia asking for a meeting.

Sobolewski, a resident of Fort Assiniboine, Alta., said he would be in Poland to attend the July 11 meeting of the International Auschwitz Council and would present letters opposed to the compensation claim from Canadian churches and Jewish supporters.

Grzegorz Jazowksi, press attache at the Polish embassy in Ottawa, said he knew of Sobolewski's concerns and of the news accounts of the case. He said the embassy has not yet had any independent confirmation of the facts from Poland but that Sobolewski's request for a meeting would be forwarded to the justice ministry.

Sobolewski said the Polish newspaper reported that Judge Ewa Gutowska reviewed the case of Stefan Wyszkowksi on Oct. 16, 1992. He had been convicted in 1952 of "guarding the area" while 12 Jews in the village of Podosie were murdered by members of the Polish underground organization, Armja Krajowa.

Relying on legislation passed in 1991, Gutowska annulled Wyszkowksi's conviction.

"We will ask the minister of justice of Poland to use his good offices to prevent further payments for two other accomplices," Sobolewski said. "Who will understand that the Polish government is paying convicted murderers for the time they spent in jail?...This is just impossible."

Journalists go 'surfing' on the network of hate

Scene in Ottawa

By RICHARD CLEROUX

OTTAWA — Sol Littman and his colleagues from the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Los Angeles took Parliament Hill by storm recently with a presentation on computer hatred that shocked even hardened old parliamentary news reporters.

In a press conference room in the Centre Block, journalists watched in stunned silence as Rick Eaton, a computer expert with the Wiesenthal Centre, led them on a tour of databases, web sites and electronic bulletin boards around the world, pulling out page after page of full-color hate literature.

Eaton, who once went under cover for the FBI in Germany posing as an American millionaire, in order to penetrate hate groups, commented on each item as he surfed the hate net.

It was all there. Toronto's Ernst Zundel, safely publishing on-line outside the law from a web site in California; Wolfgang Droege, of the Canadian Heritage Front; as well as messages of hate from every variety of skinhead, hammerskin, Ku Klux Klan and historical revisionist imaginable — all readily available to anyone with a computer, a modem and some time on their hands.

Many of the journalists didn't know what to say. It was an eye-opener. They had long equated hate literature with badly-written, poor quality, black-and-white pamphlets found under windshield wipers in supermarket parking lots.

But suddenly some very professional looking material was being scrolled up before their eyes by Eaton, with quality graphics and multi-color Germanic script headlines, presented in an easy-to-get-at format, looking for all the world like some attractive, full-color magazine.

It didn't take a genius to figure out what impact this hate material might have on an innocent young mind at home in a basement rec room in front of the computer screen.

This was precisely the effect that Littman, the Canadian director of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, had wanted — to shock the journalists present into realizing the extent of the threat.

It was Littman, better known to journalists as the country's premier Nazi hunter, who forced the federal government in 1985 to set up a commission of inquiry led by Justice Jules Deschênes into Nazi war criminals in Canada. Littman named names and pointed the finger at more than 300 suspected Nazi war criminals.

The inquiry that followed exposed Canada's secret and shameful open-door policy towards Nazi war criminals after World War II. But it also opened up a lot of old wounds in the Jewish and Ukrainian communities, some of which still have not healed.

For this, and because of his often caustic style and an uncompromising approach, Littman has frequently been criticized publicly by Jews and gentiles alike.

The government eventually passed a war crimes law allowing war criminals to be put on trial, but the law proved largely unsuccessful, and Canada has returned to the practice of trying to deport Nazi war criminals.

It is not Littman's fault that the law failed or that very few of the people he named were ever arrested, let alone charged, convicted or even deported.

Now Littman has focused his attention on computer hate, bringing to this latest campaign the same energy he put into exposing war criminals. The Wiesenthal Centre in the United States has been monitoring the growing wave of hate on the Internet for some time.

Littman and Eaton were accompanied to Ottawa by Rabbi Abraham Cooper, the international dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre. They discussed computer hate with officials from the Solicitor General's Department, the Security Intelligence Review Committee and the departments of Industry and Canadian Heritage.

Littman has not been the only one to discover hate on the Internet in Canada. The Canadian Jewish Congress held a forum in Toronto last year entitled Hate in Cyberspace and later made a series of recommendations to the federal government.

It will be difficult to crack down on computer hate, Littman told the journalists. By its very nature, the Internet is not subject to supervision, regulation or sanction. But if it remains unchecked and unregulated, he warned, hatred carried on the Internet will influence innocent young minds who are the main users of system.

At his news conference, Littman formally urged that the Internet be brought under Broadcasting Act regulation by the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission, forcing computer servers to be required to apply for licences to operate, and setting standards of operation for the service.

Insiders on Parliament Hill say the government is unlikely to follow this advice. More likely, it will opt to treat hate messages on the Internet as telephone conversations, so as to avoid the problem of trying to regulate the Internet as a broadcasting service.

The federal government is beginning to prepare legislation to crack down on electronic hate literature. It won't be easy.

Canada's anti-hate laws already cover computer generated hate messages sent over the Internet. The problem is trying to police where the material enters the Internet. It can enter anywhere in the world. And many countries, including the United States, have freedom of speech provisions which make it unconstitutional to prevent the free expression of even hate messages.

Littman is aware of this and adds that we must still try to arrive at uniform, worldwide regulation of the Internet. It won't happen overnight, he admits, but we have to keep on trying.

When a bigger building with innovative services became a reality in 1968, we dreamed of a world renowned research team on site. The Rotman Research Institute was born 20 years later.

Now it's time, once again, to turn dreams into reality and continue our caring heritage, through the Baycrest Campaign.

The existing Jewish Home for the Aged does not meet the needs of our elderly; rooms are too small, bathing facilities are inadequate and there is too little privacy. We need a new Home.

The incidence of cognitive impairment is increasing steeply as people live longer. We need a Centre for Cognitive Disorders. There are so many isolated elderly living in the community who depend on us more than ever before. We need to deliver more essential services to them.

As we reflect on this Canada Day holiday, remembering our past, our traditions, and our heritage, we must also remember our dreams for the future.

Your gift to the Baycrest Campaign will help Baycrest build the future. Is there any more compelling reason to give?

Hardly a coincidence

The Shiite fundamentalists of Lebanon recently increased the level of violence directed at Israel. Last week three IDF soldiers and one South Lebanese Army soldier met their death at the hands of the Hezbollah. Katyusha rockets rained down on the northern and western Galilee killing one person and injuring at least eight. This followed a series of rocket salvos the previous week in which a number of people were injured.

It is hardly a coincidence that the violence escalated on the eve of meetings scheduled in Washington between Israel's chief of staff Maj.-Gen. Amnon Shahak and his Syrian counterpart Hikmat Shehabi. For Hafez al-Assad, it is a trademark, simply part of his sadistic negotiating norms.

The road from Teheran to the Hezbollah in south Lebanon cuts through the Bekaa Valley, where tens of thousands of Syrian troops are stationed. Damascus controls the route carrying supplies and armaments from Iran to the Shiite fundamentalists. Most observers and experts believe that, if it wanted, Damascus could prevent Hezbollah's murderous activities. That Hezbollah is still active in south Lebanon is a sign that Damascus does not yet want to constrain them. But the Syrian dictator had better change his mind soon. The Israeli public will not countenance an agreement with him on the Golan if he demonstrates such disdain for Israeli life in the Galilee and elsewhere.

As the editorial writer for the the liberal Israeli daily Ha'aretz wrote: "If Assad believes the public in Israel is ready to give up the Golan Heights and also forfeit her soldiers in south Lebanon and civilians in the north to the Katyusha bombardments, he will discover he is making a mistake."

Louis Lenkinski, Z'L

Last week Louis Lenkinski passed away. He was a unique, wonderful man. He didn't merely swim in the current of life; he steered it. He was a man of many commitments, campaigns and causes: the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Ontario Human Rights Commission, the Ontario Federation of Labor, the CCF and the NDP. But in addition to the family he loved so dearly, he had only one true and lifelong loyalty: the advancement and welfare of his fellow human being.

Lenkinski understood that, for the ideal of justice and equity to mean anything, it had to be experienced and felt by "ordinary" people in the countless ordinary ways they lived their lives every day: in the workplace, the playground, the street and the coffeehouse. To Louis, the dignity of man was no mere postcard slogan or coffee-table book theme. It was the breath he breathed; it was the north star guiding him through his entire, active, eventful life.

But, after all the years, the struggles, the campaigns, the battles, the burdens, the joys; the commitments and the responsibilities, his heart stopped beating, unable any longer to carry forward his remarkable mind, body and soul. We are diminished, somehow lesser, now that he no longer is with us. But we and the world have been made greater that he once lived.

May his memory be forever for blessing.

Canada Day

The kind of Canada which, through his numerous efforts, commitments and labors, Louis helped to build, and for whose values he dedicated his entire life, is the Canada we must celebrate on July 1. Victimized twice – by fascism and by communism – Lenkinski cherished democracy and freedom.

And we also cherish them. For as certainly as do the mineral-laden Canadian shield, the snow-capped peaks of the Rockies, the countless fresh-water lakes and streams, the lush and verdant forests, the tundra and taiga of the north, they too form the bedrock of Canada. They are the transcendent values to which we hold true.

In our hands, mature, careful, beaten by weather and time, are those of our children, innocent, trusting and untested. In their hands they hold the hope of every parent, the dream of every sentient and caring human being, namely, the possibility of a future for self and for community that is freedom's true call: fulfilling, rewarding and free from fear or hatred.

That is the Canada which Louis Lenkinski, and all who are like-minded — adult and child — will celebrate on Canada Day.

A "Word" About the Rebbe

Sometimes a word resonates beyond its literal meaning. Sometimes a word — one word — embodies a movement, a philosophy — even an individual. For example, the Hebrew word emes (Truth) means not just the honesty and integrity we associate with Truth, but also the consistency and persistence that make Truth true. The letters of the word emes are the first, middle and last of Hebrew alphabet; this tells us that for something to be emes, its reality must be evident from the beginning through to the end. That is, emes must be not only moral and righteous, but also tenacious and enduring. Anything else is a compromise — and emes never compromises. If something endures from the beginning through the middle and then almost reaches the end, but does not quite get there, it's not emes and never was.

The prophet Malachi connects the emes of the Jewish people with the immutability of G-d: "I G-d have changed and you Israel have not been destroyed." G-d who never changes chose the Jewish people to implement His plan for creation. As G-d's instrument, we have endured persecution, assimilations, all the conditions that have threatened our survival. Our continued existence is proof that we, as a people, are emes.

If the Jewish people are emes because of their role in G-d's plan, we may well ask, what is G-d's plan? What was His purpose in creation? Our sages tell us that G-d wanted to make this physical world a "dwelling place" for Himself. In other words, G-d's presence should be revealed even — especially — in this lowest of all words, the one most removed from spirituality. We accomplish this by performing mitzvot (Divine commands) which involve physical actions within a material world. We may also say, then, that the Jewish people are emes because our mitzvot achieve His objective for the world.

(As an aside, this explains the emes, the integration of the Thirteen Principles of Faith. The beginning, of course, is the belief in one G-d, the middle — the truth of Torah — Torat emes. The completion, what makes the structure of Judaism emes, is the last two principles, belief in the coming of Mashiach and belief in T'chiyat Hameitim — the revival of the dead.)

If the Jewish people are emes because of an innate connection with G-d, then every Jew, no matter how far he or she may have strayed from Judaism, is endowed with a spark of Divinity and given the mission to transform this world. But individuals are different. The Divine spark — the emes within — may burn brighter in some than in others. We see, for instance, the difference between Moses and the rest of his generation. And indeed, the Torah itself tells us there will always be a "Moses" in every generation — that is, one Jew who individually epitomizes emes, whose spark has been fanned into a fiery flame, whose every fiber is consumed with a love for G-d and a passionate desire to implement His will.

In our generation, this individual is the Rebbe.

Every tzaddik, every Jewish leader, every G-dly individual has his or her special mission which reflects the unique attribute which sets them apart from all others.

The Rebbe's particular mission as leader of our generation is reflected in the Divine quality of emes. The Rebbe's entire life was dedicated to bringing not just more holiness, but complete holiness into the world. The Rebbe was not content with bringing virtually all Jews onto the path of Torah and mitzvot; every Jew must be on the path. The Rebbe was not satisfied with disseminating the fountains of Torah to most of the far flung places on this planet; every Jew has to have access to all dimensions of Torah. The Rebbe could not rest until every Jew was out of the dark, materially and spiritually, until all of us see the complete realization of G-d's plan for the universe: a world that conforms to the highest ideals of Divinity, righteousness, knowledge and goodness.

This is the world of Mashiach!

This is the truth — the emes — of gimel Tammuz; the day of the Rebbe's physical passing from this world.

The Rebbe's desire to bring Mashiach was motivated by his passion for the integrity of G-d, the Torah and the Jewish people. Everything the Rebbe told us, including the prophecy about the imminence of the Redemption remains true, truly emes. Whatever change occured on gimel Tammuz, despite its negative appearance, the Rebbe is harnessing it into a positive force which will make the Redemption imminent and more powerful.

Gimel Tamuz is not a day of mourning, G-d forbid. It is a day when a renewed and strengthened commitment is to be made by each and every one of us who believes in emes, to the Rebbe and to his message. We must bring to the entire world the Rebbe's message of "Higiyah Zeman Ge'ulatchem — The Time Of Redemption Has arrived" and make everyone realize that as far as the Rebbe is concerned, nothing has changed, and that by adding acts of goodness and kindness, strengthening in the observance of Torah and mitzvot and studying the subjects of Mashiach and Redemption, we will highten our preparedness to welcome the genuine and complete Redemption, immediately!

Perspectives

The other fundamentalists

By STEVEN EMERSON

Excerpted from an article reprinted with permission from The New Republic, June 12, 1995. Part 1

We know, after the Oklahoma City bombing, that terrorism in the United States can take many forms — domestic and foreign, populist and insurrectionist, from those with bizarre domestic grudges to those with radical foreign agendas. The growing awareness of this threat is part of what motivated the closing of Pennsylvania Avenue in front of the White House.

Until Oklahoma City, the consensus in the FBI was that, of the various extremist groups in the United States, it was radical Islamist groups that most gravely threaten American security. And for all the new evidence of domestic terrorism, that judgment remains the same. Over the past year alone, the FBI has created dozens of special units around the country — with hundreds of agents and analysts — whose tasks include tracking these radical Islamist groups.

A two-year investigation I recently concluded helps show why the government is so concerned. The investigation — which involved hundreds of interviews with moderate and militant Islamist officials and with law enforcement and intelligence officials, as well as the acquisition of more than 150,000 documents, publications and recordings produced by radical Islamist groups — revealed that these groups have established elaborate political, financial and, in some cases, operational infrastructures in the United states.

Because of the scope of this movement (it ranges from New York to Oklahoma to California), its bellicose rhetoric (it calls for a holy war or jihad against the U.S. and other governments) and its advocacy of terror to achieve its ends (it trains recruits in the use of car bombs), it's no wonder the FBI has made this network a top priority.

Islam is the fastest growing religion in the U.S., and the vast majority of Muslims in America are peaceful and law-abiding and do not condone violence. But in recent years, an extremist fringe of militant Islamism has taken root here. To avoid raising suspicion and to take advantage of civil liberties protections, these militant groups often reconstitute themselves here as "research," "charitable" or "civil rights" institutions.

Oliver B. Revell, a former senior FBI official in charge of counter-terrorist and counter-intelligence investigations, puts the objectives of these groups in no uncertain terms. "They are ultimately committed to waging holy war, both in the Middle East and the world at large against all of their opposition," he says. "And that means us."

Seif Ashmawi, the Egyptian-born American-based publisher of a bilingual newspaper called The Voice of Peace, concurs. "The aim of these groups," Ashmawi says, "is the same as their aim in the Middle East: to build and expand their radical religious-political empire and eliminate or discredit all their enemies, particularly Muslims like myself who don't agree with radical fundamentalists' claim to represent Islam."

Although there is no evidence that these myriad Islamist groups are centrally coordinated, it does appear that they collaborate and cross-fertilize. Evidence collected by federal investigators in the cases related to the Feb. 26, 1993, World Trade Centre bombing, for example, shows that leaders or representatives of at least five different groups — including the Palestinian-based Islamic Jihad, Hamas, the Sudanese National Islamic Front, the Pakistan-based al-Fuqrah (a black Islamist group) and groups funded by Persian Gulf donors — were involved in the plot.

Perhaps the best places to observe what brings these groups together are the Islamist coventions, held annually, often in the bland hotels and convention centres of Midwestern cities. Among the best-attended are those sponsored by the Muslim Arab Youth Association (MAYA). Founded in 1974 and headquartered in Plainfield, Ind., MAYA has evolved into an umbrella organization for militant Islamist groups around the world.

MAYA, like its parent organization, Muslim Brotherhood, embraces the belief that Western, particularly American society, is morally corrupt, intrinsically anti-Islamic and evil. "In the heart of America, in the depths of corruption and ruin and moral deprivation, an elite of Muslim youth is holding fast to the teachings of Allah," states the preface to MAYA's "Constitution," which is printed in Arabic and distributed at its conventions. A companion publication, Guide for the Muslim Family in America, explains: "Western civilization is based upon the separation of religion from life ... Islamic civilization is based upon principles fundamentally opposed to those of Western civilization."

Among this year's more popular lecturers was the bearded, avuncular-looking Bassam al-Amoush, a member of the Islamic coalition in the Jordanian parliament, who boasted of how his party boycotted U.S. President Bill Clinton's address to that body. "Somebody approached me at the mosque [in Amman] and asked me, 'If I see a Jew in the street, should I kill him?' " al-Amoush said, putting on a dumbfounded face. " 'Don't ask me,' I said to him. 'After you kill him, come and tell me.' " The crowd roared with laughter. "What do you want from me, a fatwa [religious ruling]? Really, a good deed does not require one."

Minutes later, a message was handed to the master of ceremonies, who read it aloud. A hush fell over the conference room as he announced: "We have very good news. There was an attack on a bus in Jerusalem, perpetrated by a Palestinian policeman. Nineteen were wounded and three were killed. Hamas has taken responsibility for the act." (This was on Dec. 26, when a Hamas suicide bomber blew up a bus in downtown Jerusalem. It was later revealed that only the bomber died; 12 Israelis were wounded.) The crowd responded with shouts of "Allahu Akbar!"

For al-Amoush, like other militant Islamist leaders before him, the visit to the United States provided an opportunity to raise morale and support among American Muslims for the Islamist movement worldwide. Here, unlike in his native land, al-Amoush doesn't have to worry about the authorities clamping down on him.

In Jordan, members of his Islamic coalition had come under sharp scrutiny after Jordanian police uncovered their involvement in an assassination plot against King Hussein and in efforts to supply weapons to Hamas for attacks on Israel. In the U.S., he can speak without worry. Six months earlier, he addressed a smaller gathering of fundamentalists in Detroit, where he assured his listeners that it was "certainly possible to defeat America, as the Vietnamese demonstrated." He declared America "the number one enemy and ... the Great Satan."

Many times, the incendiary speech heard at Islamist conventions remains simply an outlet for frustration and a reminder of long-standing grievances. But over the past few years, it has at times, in the eyes of a few zealots, become a call for waging a kind of holy war in the U.S. One of the first indications that a militant fringe was preparing for jihad on U.S. soil was an incident that took place on August 29, 1989. That day, according to FBI documents, a Connecticut state trooper stopped a vehicle carrying six "Middle Eastern persons" near the High Rock Shooting Range in Naugatuck, Conn. The trooper found a small arsenal of semi-automatic weapons and several out-of-state licence plates in the trunk. The guns belonged to the driver, a local gun dealer and former Waterbury policeman of Albanian origin, who said he was training volunteers to fight against the Soviets in Afghanistan. Since the weapons were legally licensed, no arrests were made. A computer check found, however, that the extra licence plates were registered to El-Sayyid Nosair, who later was arrested for the shooting on Nov. 5, 1990, of militant Jewish leader Rabbi Meir Kahane. After that shooting, the police found in Nosair's possession a gun license registered in the name of the same former Waterbury cop who was driving the car in August 1989.

More than two years earlier, FBI informants had reported seeing weapons in the al-Farouq Mosque in Brooklyn. But an application for a wiretap on the mosque was denied by the Justice Department. Since any escalation of the probe could be seen as violating federal guidelines that require advance evidence of criminal conspiracy, surveillance was first restricted and ultimately curtailed. Yet, unknown to authorities at the time, the al-Farouq Mosque had also become a centre for counterfeiting tens of thousands of dollars, shipping bomb components to Hamas in Israel, reconfiguring passports to enable Muslim volunteers to visit the U.S. and enlisting new recruits for the worldwide jihad.

In those days before the World Trade Centre bombing, the FBI was sometimes caught off guard by the Islamist threat. On Nov. 6, 1990, hours after Nosair was arrested for the murder of Kahane, police raided his New Jersey apartment and carted away 47 boxes of personal papers. But because much of it was in Arabic and deemed "irrelevant, religious" material, the contents were shelved until days after the World Trade Centre bombing. When leads in the investigation of the bombing indicated Islamist involvement, investigators returned to Nosair's cache and discovered what they had missed: a road map to an international terrorist network headquartered in the U.S., including plans he detailed in one notebok to "demoralize the enemies of Allah ... by means of destroying and blowing up the pillars of their civilization and blowing up the tourist attractions they are so proud of and the high buildings they are so proud of."

Also ignored until after the bombing were cassette tapes Nosair had made of telephone conversations between the U.S.-based holy warriors and their Pakistan-based and Palestinian counterparts and leaders. In one conversation, Abdul Rahman (apparently speaking from Peshawar, Pakistan) asks his followers in New Jersey about "camps" in the United States. On the tape, a male voice responds, "It was a success. It started Friday evening and ended Monday. It lasted three days, and we expect positive results."

The World Trade Centre conspiracy and subsequent trials have provided a rich source of materials on the extensive terrorist infrastructure in the New York and New Jersey areas. "But," says Revell, "it is only a small part of the picture. There is an extensive subterranean network in the United States of radical militants whose activities are not illegal. What we need to focus on is what these people are saying — that's the key to understanding what they will do."

Steven Emerson, executive producer of the PBS documentary Jihad in America, is completing a book on radical Islamist networks.

Next week, CJN will print Part 2 of Emerson's essay dealing with Hamas in the United States.

Opinions

The Bernardo trial in perspective

Americans have been following the O. J. Simpson trial for many months now and by all accounts are beginning to lose interest in it. Meanwhile Canada has picked up the slack and occupies itself with the gruesome details of the Bernardo trial. The jurors see the horrible details while the public hears of them second and third hand.

By [illegible]

"What motivates people to stand in line overnight to be able to hear this kind of thing and watch the main actors in this dismal show?" someone asked me the other day. Psychologists have all sorts of answers, but there is no question about the objective fact that a lot of people love to see horror stories, and especially so when they are mixed with sexually explicit images. The Bernardo trial, of course, is of a different nature: Here we deal with realities and not just fiction cooked up for the benefit of the prurient.

"Well," my acquaintance said, "if you criticize this kind of interest on the part of individuals, why would you support the existence of Holocaust museums? Aren't they also showing the horrendous things that people did and the depth of depravity of which human beings are capable?"

The parallels are only on the surface. Museums are not videotapes, and they are not criminal trials but historical documents. I fully understand a Holocaust survivor who does not want to have old wounds opened again, but I will never fail to urge everyone else — gentiles and especially Jews — to look at a part of history that must be remembered. A famous saying (ascribed to various authors) warns that if we do not confront history we might be condemned to experience it once again. Holocaust museums are educational tools; they speak of human capacity for evil in a way that no text book could do. History is a powerful teacher.

For this reason I have urged people to visit a Holocaust museum whenever possible and wherever one exists. For even if it is a modest affair, it cannot fail to bring something of that reality that must be confronted and remembered.

Now of course there is a great museum in Washington, and I have suggested on earlier occasions that you make it your business to visit it. Give it enough time to render the trip worthwhile.

The one country in which there is no Holocaust museum at the present time is Germany. Germans have simply not been able to confront the past to its fullest extent. Let it be said in praise of recent governments that they have urged the new generation to look at the past clearly and without blinkers. Meanwhile, Germany is the one country where public denial of the Holocaust is a criminal offence.

There are also voices in Germany that want to be done with the past and claim that this constant reminder of what once went on lessens national pride and keeps alive something with which the present generation had nothing to do. So far, those who want to remember their yesteryears are having the upper hand, and a German Holocaust museum would be a powerful tool to keep it that way. In addition, it would constitute a major blow at "historical revisionism," that is, the denial of the Holocaust.

If and when it is built, it will not appeal to the kinds of sentiments which bring visitors to the Bernardo trial. The latter go for the thrill of it. But visitors to a Holocaust museum see what one nation did a half century ago. It means confronting the past and thereby oneself. Any comparison with the Bernardo trial draws a false psychological and historical parallel.

Hoping to legalize anthem

What is the legal national anthem of Israel?

If you replied spontaneously, Hatikvah, you are wrong. Israel has no national anthem legally approved as such. When the state came into being in 1948, the anthem of the Zionist movement was carried over and purely by default, it became the anthem of the state. It enjoys no legal status whatever. In contrast, it should be noted that both the national flag and the official seal of the state have been officially designated by the Knesset.

By Carl Mpart

At one time, the Orthodox suggested that the state's anthem should be Shir HaMa'alot, the 126th Psalm, one of those sung by pilgrims in days of old when they went up to Jerusalem to celebrate the festivals. Attempts to give legal status to Hatikvah have never succeeded, but now a fresh effort is being made in the present Knesset.

There have long been objections to Hatikvah on many grounds. In 1967, Uri Avneri, then a member of the Knesset, introduced a bill seeking to establish the song Jerusalem of Gold as the nation's official anthem, but the proposal made no headway.

The question was raised again in 1975, when an enterprising radio program set up a panel of leading personalities to debate the status of the hymn. The objections to Hatikvah were that the melody is not Jewish, the author of the words was a disreputable and not always sober poet by the name of Naphtali Herz Imber, the text was offensive to the Arab citizens and the Ashkenazi tone was foreign to the spirit of the Sephardi citizens of the state.

The defence of the song was that it enjoyed a tradition of long standing which gave it a hallowed place in Jewish history. Objections to the precise words were brushed aside on the grounds that sentiment and folk usage endowed it with an aura of respect and even veneration. Note was taken of the hymns of other nations in which the words had little significance. The studio jury voted to retain Hatikvah in its present status.

In 1984, a Likud Knesset member submitted a resolution to formalize the status of the anthem, but it ran into many objections. For one thing, the Arabs protested that a text which speaks of "the Jewish soul" and the 2,000-year longing of the Jews to be a free people in Zion does not represent the views of Arabs, who constitute 18 per cent of the population.

> Aura of respect and veneration

Leftists agreed with them and decided to combat the proposed legislation with ridicule. For example, Shulamit Aloni noted that since the exact music score would become part of the proposed law, anyone singing it off-key would be technically liable to prosecution as violators of that clause in the law which called for punishment of up to a year in jail for "disrespect" of the national anthem. The bill failed.

Some suggested that one day perhaps two composers, a Jew and an Arab working together, would create a truly national anthem, which all could sing without reservation.

There is still some debate regarding the origins of the melody of Hatikvah, and it is recalled that during the days of the Mandate, when the British banned the public playing of the song, broadcasters used to play parts of the Moldau composition by Smetana, which was said to be the source of the music. Smetana himself picked up the melody from a folk song which was popular in various versions in many European countries. Israeli musicologist, Brenda Miller, says it is an ideal national anthem because it comes from the heart of the people.

Those who prefer to regard Israel in universal rather than in Jewish terms ignore the fact that the blue and white flag, with its six-pointed magen David, and the official observance of the Sabbath and Jewish holidays have already fixed the Jewish identity of the state.

And so, in 1995, Knesset member Shaul Yahalom of the National Religious Party has once again brought forward a proposal to enact legislation to establish the traditional hymn as legal, and those showing disrespect for it would be liable to punishment similar to the protection given the dignity of the state flag. There is no indication yet how the Knesset will react.

An interesting footnote was recently unearthed from the historical archives by The American Israelite of Cincinnati. The paper quotes from its issue of Dec. 20, 1894, over 100 years ago: "That erratic genius, Naphtali Herz Imber, is dead [as a matter of fact, the report was premature, for Imber did not die until 1909]. He managed to annoy us a good deal by instituting a $5,000 libel suit against this paper among other things; as he is gone, let his sins be forgotten. He had something of a poet's fancy and a little bit of the poet's expression, but he produced nothing that was remembered a day after it was read or heard."

A summer day

"Summertime and the livin is easy" (Gershwin). I enjoy summer. It is the season of few expectations. But it passes by so fast, each summer going by faster than the last one. They all go at the same speed of course; its just that summer isn't as long as I would like it to be. In spite of clogged roads, poison ivy, mosquito bites, sunburn and rain on your barbecue, there's always something good and special about summer.

By Jack Cheevers

For me, one good and special thing is spending time at the cottage. After being confined indoors by a prolonged rainstorm, I took advantage of a break in the weather to go for a long solitary walk. I wandered deep into the pine woods whose fallen needles lay thick and spongy over ungrassed slopes. I picked my way through the stiff green forest where nothing moved, yet one could sense life forms hidden behind each tree. My roundabout route brought me back to the lake where I sat down on a tilted table of granite that hung out over the water. The wind came up from across the other shore and caught me head-on blowing whatever thoughts I had into ripples, until they were all gone and there was only myself and nature in the eternal present, free of the encumbrances of time.

I was far removed from the everyday domain of engineering which preoccupies me with precision, measurement and logic. In the cold persuasion of technology there is no place for love, pride, beauty, faith and fantasies. We who deal in absolutes are uncomfortable with the unexplainable. We wish our lives to be one continuous growth in knowledge. We delude ourselves into believing that we have tamed the natural and have lost our capacity for surprise and our sense of awe and marvel. We are blind to the miracles that intervene in nature.

In his book, The Firmament of Time, anthropologist Loren Eisley wrote: "I am a man who has spent a great deal of his life on his knees, though not in prayer. I do not say this last pridefully, but with the feeling that the posture, if not the thought behind it, may have some final salutary effect. I am a naturalist and a fossil hunter and I have crawled most of the way through life. I have crawled downward into holes without bottom and upward into crevices where the wind and the birds screamed at me until the sound of a falling pebble was enough to make the sick heart lurch. In man, I know now, there is no such thing as wisdom. I have learned this with my face against the ground. It is a very difficult thing for a man to grasp today, because of his power; yet in his brain there is really only a sort of universal marsh, spotted at intervals by quaking green islands representing the elusive stability of modern science — islands frequently gone as soon as glimpsed."

I sat in silence as if awaiting an event, the essence of which I did not know, but it beckoned the lonely figure of my dreams. I was close upon that void where the scientific explanation of the world about us ends and the manifestation of God's prerogative begins. Before long I was in harmony with the mystery and creative power of nature — a miniscule speck of life in an infinite universe.

The wind abated. The sun faded into the horizon. The haunting call of a loon returned me from my catatonic state, as another summer day was coming to an end.

Biographer delves into a new field

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

For the past three years, Michael Bar-Zohar — David Ben-Gurion's official biographer — has been consumed by one passion — Bulgaria.

It may seem odd at first glance that Bulgaria occupies such a place of importance in Bar-Zohar's mind. After all, as a writer, lecturer and politician, he has spent much of his professional career chronicling the twists and turns of Israel's history.

But now that communism has come to an end in Bulgaria and its archives have been thrown open to researchers, Bar-Zohar is hard at work on a book about the wartime rescue of Bulgarian Jewry, an episode usually overshadowed by a similar event in Denmark. The book, as yet untitled, is scheduled to be published in the United States next year.

Bar-Zohar, a former Israeli parliamentarian and a member of the Labor party's Central Committee, has a personal interest in Bulgaria. He was not only born in Bulgaria 57 years ago, but lived there when the fate of its 50,000-strong Jewish community hung in the balance.

A weak, agrarian Balkan land, Bulgaria was in thrall to Nazi Germany in the 1940s, until its liberation by the Red Army in 1944. At the head of its fascist, pro-German government was Bogdan Filov. In 1941, he unveiled anti-Semitic laws, which forced Jews into labor camps. Two years later, Bulgaria agreed to deport the Jewish population to death camps in Eastern Europe.

But the order was never carried out. In open defiance of the Nazis, the Eastern Orthodox church, several fascist leaders, members of parliament, professional groups and King Boris III resisted. As a result, the Jews of Bulgaria were spared.

During the Communist era, the official dogma was that "the masses" and the Communist underground saved the Jews. The role of the church, the government and the monarchy — "the enemy of the people" — was underplayed or simply ignored.

This thesis went largely unchallenged because scholars had little or no access to official files. "Thorough and objective research was not really possible," said Bar-Zohar, who was recently in Toronto to deliver a lecture at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am synagogue.

But with the flowering of democracy and the loosening of restrictions in Bulgaria, Bar-Zohar was able to delve into the archives and feast his eyes on material that hitherto had been off-limits to researchers like himself.

Bar-Zohar claims that his book will be a significant contribution to Holocaust literature. "I believe it is very important to the Jewish people and to the world to learn the story of this rescue. It proves that anti-Semitism could be defeated. It proves that it was possible to say no to Hitler."

Interestingly enough, Bar-Zohar's uncle, Baruch Lazarov, had a direct hand in the rescue effort.

In March 1943, a Bulgarian railway employee in the town of Kyustendil informed Lazarov that a large number of trains had been commandeered "for the Jews." The following day, Lazarov visited the station and, to his horror, saw a large number of cattle cars, parked out of sight.

Correctly deducing that the Jewish community was in dire danger, Lazarov hurried to the house of his childhood friend, Dimiter Peshev, the deputy speaker of parliament and a member of the fascist party. Peshev immediately left for Sofia — the capital — in an attempt to stop the planned deportation.

His plea was ultimately answered by several key personalities: Liliana Panitza, the secretary of the commissar for Jewish affairs, Alexander Belev; Metropolitan Stefan of the Eastern Orthodox church, which had opposed the 1941 anti-Jewish legislation; 43 members of parliament; Elin Pellin, the president of the Bulgarian Writers' Association; and, last but not least, King Boris himself.

Boris was not an heroic figure. He had not objected to the deportation of some 11,000 Jews in Macedonia and Thrace, areas occupied by Bulgaria in exchange for having signed a friendship treaty with Nazi Germany. But he drew the line at native Bulgarian Jews. The Germans tried to browbeat him, once in Berchtesgaden and then in Rastenburg, but he withstood the pressure.

Boris paid a heavy price for his obstinacy. Upon his return from his last meeting with Hitler, he fell ill, dying four days later. A palace communique attributed his death to a heart attack. But most Bulgarians assume he was poisoned by the Germans.

During the darkest years, from 1941 to 1944, Bar-Zohar's family was subjected to humiliating anti-Semitic edicts. His parents were compelled to wear the demeaning yellow star; they were driven out of Sofia to a remote mountain village; and in 1943, his father — a dentist — was pushed into a labor camp.

Be that as it may, the family was not physically threatened or harmed. Reviewing the reasons why Bulgarian Jewry escaped the Holocaust, Bar-Zohar cites several factors. Compared to other countries, anti-Semitism was not strong in Bulgaria, and the Jews were well integrated into Bulgarian society. Furthermore, the Eastern Orthodox church hewed to a tradition of tolerance.

After the war, in common with the majority of Bulgarian Jews, Bar-Zohar and his parents immigrated to Israel. They settled in Jaffa, where conditions were exceedingly difficult. "Jaffa in those days was harder than Sofia had been during the war," he said.

Finishing his military service, Bar-Zohar studied political science and international relations at the Hebrew University and the University of Paris. In 1964, he wrote his first of many books, Suez Top Secret, which dealt with the 1956 Middle East war. The best-selling, prize-winning volume was based on his PhD thesis.

Flushed with confidence, Bar-Zohar sent an inscribed copy to David Ben-Gurion, who had just resigned as prime minister. And through Ben-Gurion's secretary, he offered his services as a biographer. "I didn't expect a reply. Ben-Gurion had refused approaches by historians."

Ben-Gurion, however, was restive after his resignation and wanted to tell his story. And since Suez Top Secret impressed him, he asked Bar-Zohar to write his biography, which was eventually published under the title of Ben-Gurion, the Armed Prophet. Although Ben-Gurion wasn't satisfied with every sentence in Bar-Zohar's book, he was sufficiently happy with it. In the 1970s, Bar-Zohar produced a three-volume account of his subject's life, Ben-Gurion: A Political Biography, which has been translated into a number of foreign languages.

Ben-Gurion was a complex, contradictory man. All but single-handedly, under extremely adverse conditions, he created a Jewish state. His biggest setback, Bar-Zohar muses, was his failure to settle the barren wastes of the Negev with a substantial Jewish population.

As a leader, Ben-Gurion tended to be hawkish with respect to the Arabs. But in his last years, he moderated his views and urged Israel to withdraw from all the territories except the Golan Heights and East Jerusalem, in return for real peace.

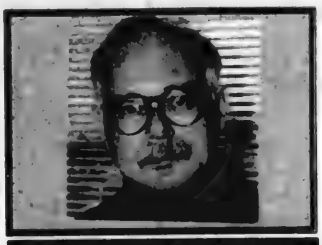
In the aftermath of the 1967 Six Day War, Bar-Zohar was briefly Moshe Dayan's press secretary. Bar-Zohar remembers Dayan (then minister of defence) as a creative politician with great leadership qualities. But Dayan grew too complacent of Israel's Arab foes, and during the 1973 Yom Kippur War, he lost his inimitable spark.

Bar-Zohar, who's currently a research fellow at Emory University in Atlanta, Georgia, plans to run for the Knesset in the 1996 election. He served in the Knesset from 1981 to 1984 and again from 1988 to 1992.

As an MK, Bar-Zohar — a centrist — initiated the passage of bills in education, human rights and sexual harassment. He also pushed for electoral reform.

Bar-Zohar regrets he cannot find time these days to produce more spy novels. Writing under the pen names of Michael Barak and Michael Hastings, he has turned out a steady stream of thrillers, notably The Third Truth, Enigma (which was made into a Hollywood movie) and The Phantom Conspiracy.

Clearly, he has his sights set on his forthcoming book and, of course, on the hurly-burly of Israeli politics.



Mideast Analysis

By Sheldon Kirshner

Reclaiming the desert

Yitzhak Moshe, a soil conservationist with the Jewish National Fund (JNF), is rolling back the desert in the northern Negev. He and his colleagues are doing it the hard way, hectare by hectare, to reverse the scourge of desertification.

The JNF's goal is to turn barren wilderness into shaded savannah, Moshe explained as he stood in a sandy gully one recent morning. It will prevent soil erosion and facilitate the creation of parks and grazing land for sheep.

"The idea," he said, "is to create green spaces — recreational areas — for towns in the Negev and thereby upgrade the quality of life for its residents."

The ambitious land reclamation project has no agricultural application, since it is not economically feasible to pipe in water for farming. Rainfall around Ofakim, Moshe's area of jurisdiction, is scarce, up to eight inches per year as compared to 24 inches on the coastal plain and 32 inches in the Galilee.

In the last few years, the JNF has salvaged about 2,000 hectares, which works out to some 300 hectares annually. By Moshe's estimation, the cost of developing one hectare in the first year is about $200. It takes about seven years to prepare the land for grazing, and even after that usage is strictly regulated.

Thanks to its savannization program, Israel has become a world leader in combating desertification, a problem which plagues Africa and Asia. Recently, scientists from 14 countries visited the Negev, touring the JNF's Sayeret Shaked research station, near Ofakim, to study Israeli methods.

Close to an air force base and an army firing range, the station was established 10 years ago, after scientists like Moshe determined that ecologically-sound management of arid and semi-arid lands can halt, even reverse, desertification.

The JNF works in cooperation with, among others, Ben-Gurion University's Mitrani Centre for Desert Ecology, the Ministry of Agriculture's Soil Erosion Research Station and the Israel Agricultural Research Organization.

Savannization focuses on creating patches of green through tree plantings. The saplings — pines, eucalyptuses, cypresses, sycamores, acacias and oaks — are grown in a computerized nursery in Gilat said to be one of the largest and the most modern in the Middle East. The nursery produces about one million saplings per annum.

The green spaces are nourished by runoff water "harvested" by a network of canals and dirt dams. It is not an original method. The ancient Nabateans devised the technique more than 2,000 years ago.

Restored by the Ottoman Turks and the British, the Nabatean cisterns — which can hold several hundred cubic metres of fresh water — are still in use today. Virtually the only ones who tap into the cisterns are Bedouin herders, many of whom move about with their flocks in a custom immortalized by time.

By RABBI DAVID ELLIS

This week's parshah deals with the rebellion of Korach and his followers against Moses and Aaron. Why, Korach asks, does the leadership of the people rest with Moses and the privilege of the priesthood with Aaron and his family? After all, are not all of the people holy? Is not G-d among them?

We saw recently in our readings that Moses was not jealous of challenges to his leadership. When Joshua wished to restrain Eldad and Medad from remaining in the tent and prophesying (Numbers 11:26 ff.), Moses demurred, wishing that all of the people should be prophets.

Moreover, Korach's claim apparently has a basis in G-d's own words to the people. When the children of Israel were before Mount Sinai, G-d had said they would be "a kingdom of priests and a holy people" (Exodus 19:6). Later, before they began their journeys in the wilderness, they were told to build a sanctuary, that G-d might dwell among them (Exodus 25:8). What then is wrong with Korach's rebellion?

Korach's fault was that he reduced worthy, long-range ideals to the level of average and immediate accessibility. The promise that they should be a holy people was put before them as a task to be achieved, not as a fait accompli.

That G-d was among them was also contingent upon the people's following the will of G-d and was never guaranteed. While Moses might forgo his honor to Eldad and Medad, it was his prerogative to do so, not something which others could usurp at will.

Our sages note that Korach engaged in arguments of Torah with Moses, asking if a tallit which was all blue required the blue thread of the tzitzit, or if a room full of Torah scrolls required a mezuzah upon the doorpost. There is in fact nothing wrong with arguing about the Torah, even for the wrong reasons (sh'lo lishmah), for example, to gain prestige, to be called a rabbi. Our sages were confident that one would eventually come to pursue it for the right reasons (lishmah). This is only true, however, if the intent was not evil to begin with — to quarrel and evoke protest (Tosefot, Pesachim 50b).

Korach's revolt was the latter type of sh'lo lishmah. Indeed, our sages, in their careful reading of the parshah, note that there is dissension even within Korach's ranks. The classic example of an argument not for the sake of heaven is not the quarrel of Korach and Moses but that of Korach and his own followers (Pirkei Avot 4:20).

But in the end, Korach had no need for his argument. Part of Korach's claim is that his tribe, the Levites, were denied privileges in favor of the priests, the kohanim. The Mishnah (Horavot 3:8) indeed notes that there are certain gradations in status among the Jewish people, in regard to who would be saved in the case of an emergency.

A kohen is saved before a levi, a levi before a yisrael, a yisrael before a mamzer, a slave and others. When, asks the Mishnah, does this rule apply? When everyone is equal. But were a mamzer to be a Torah scholar, he would be saved before a high priest who was an ignoramous. Although there may be various divisions of role and responsibility within our people, the study of Torah holds the highest place, and it is available even to the most despised of the classes.

Korach could have ascended to greatness had he devoted himself to the study of Torah.

Although Korach was punished for his rebellion, his descendants eventually carried out what should have been his destiny. The sons of Korach wrote Psalms; and the prophet Samuel, mentioned in greatness with Moses and Aaron, was from the family of Korach (I Chronicles 6:7-13).

What does the story of Korach tell us today? The German philospher Max Scheler made a classic study of the man of ressentiment who feels powerless in the face of overwhelming events, looks for a reality which is levelled out to common sense availability, distrusts talent, status and distinction among people. Far from being insignificant and passive, the man of ressentiment is apt to hearken to the call for a rebellion to bring about his designs. Scheler, writing in 1912, described a phenomenon which would appear in Europe in the 1930s, as millions of disenchanted came to be mesmerized by the appeal of Nazism.

Korach in his time also appealed to the man of ressentiment, and his story is a paradigm for our understanding of other rebellions in history. In our own time of economic uncertainty, moral confusion, and rapid change and disruption, we must always be aware of a Korach who may come to speak to the disenfranchised.

Torah study for women

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Yarchei Kallah for women, a program of intensive Torah study, will be held at Or Chaim Yeshiva, 159 Almore Dr., from July 31 to August 3.

The week-long program, sponsored by Canadian Friends of Nishmat and under the auspices of the Or Chaim Kollel, is designed for women of all ages and educational levels.

Working largely in pairs (called chavrutahs) they will study texts in English or Hebrew dealing with eight prophetesses in the Bible — Sarah, Esther, Yechevet, Miriam, Devorah, Chanah, Avigail and Ruth.

This will be followed by a seminar led by Rabbanit Chana Henkin, founder and director of Nishmat, the Jerusalem Centre for Advanced Jewish Study for Women.

Jewish texts

Rebecca Rotenberg Nadler, one of the organizers of the event, said that Rabbanit Henkin was concencerned that women were encouraged to study secular subjects on an advanced level, but not limudei kodesh (religious studies).

She founded Nishmat in Jerusalem for university-aged and older women to study "without any preset limits.

"If their bent is toward Tanach (Bible), that's fine. If it's for Gemara, that's fine too. They learn to become comfortable with Jewish texts."

Nearly 400 women are enrolled at Nishmat, including Ethiopians and Russians.

For more information about Yarchei Kallah, call Nadler, 488-8502; Dianna Roberts Zaudererer, 787-6446; or Elaine Rubinoff, 905-881-8732.

Jewish Life

Tomorrow, who knows?

By CHUCK GOLD and CAROL KASSEL

Felix Shachman, 21, was so anxious to leave that he taught himself Hebrew for a year before he could finally leave his home north of Kiev.

GUEST VOICES

At 82, a widowed grandmother on the same plane said she was too old to learn Hebrew but too smart to stay in Ukraine. "My son said, 'Why are you staying here?' " she told us. 'It's dark here. The sun is shining in Israel.' "

Air Ukraine Flight 001 from Kiev to Tel Aviv was chartered by the UJA-supported Jewish Agency, known as the sochnut. It is a relief flight. Except for the dozen members of our UJA delegation, the 80 olim on board expressed their relief at being able to leave the bitter reality of Ukrainian life, especially Jewish life in Ukraine.

We asked some of those who remain there just how bitter. Sarah, an older Jewish woman who lives alone in a tiny Kiev apartment, has diabetes and rarely gets out of her home. Yet, the Joint Distribution Committee, which works very closely with the sochnut, manages to arrange a visit only once a month, because of an ever expanding client list. Sarah cried continuously during our visit. She told us she was "as lonely as a finger."

We asked 87-year-old Gregory, a war veteran whose wife died six months ago. The boys from a local Jewish school try to visit him whenever they can. Gregory eats mostly beets and carrots for lunch and dinner.

And we asked Jewish school students themselves — some of them attending sochnut-sponsored Hebrew classes. Virtually all of them talked about an anti-Semitic incident they had experienced personally.

Ukraine is no place for Jews

With a collapsing economy, a rising crime rate and a long history of hatred, Ukraine is no place for Jews. The sochnut, which is in effect the government of the Jewish people in the former Soviet Union, is working day and night to get them out.

The name sochnut is magic in Ukraine. It is admired by Jews, resented by some non-Jews and respected by everyone. The commitment of sochnut personnel is almost superhuman. It was humbling to see.

Every year, at least 25,000 Jews take advantage of the Agency's freedom flights to Israel. It is an urgent situation. Today the Ukrainian government, to its credit, permits unrestricted Jewish emigration. However, economic instability often triggers drastic reactions. Tomorrow, who knows?

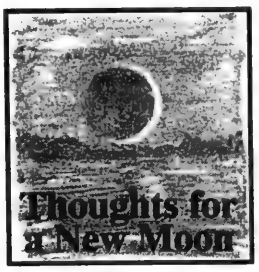
Time is ticking away on Jewish history in Ukraine, where cultural, political and religious giants once lived. The incredible revival of Jewish education and kashrut after decades of Communist tyranny was wonderful to witness, but illusory. It fills the needs of the moment but not the needs of the future.

Jewish identity, which centuries of anti-Semitism could not suppress, is being expressed through Zionism. And Zionism means moving to Israel, with the UJA-funded network of generous assistance. Ten years from now, mostly the old and frail will remain as Ukraine's legacy of Jewish life.

The Ukrainian town of Chmelnitzky, named after a notorious anti-Semitic murderer, typifies the Jewish situation. Three thousand Jews still live there, led by a young rabbi, Peretz Charach, whom we met in the Kiev synagogue. In the not-so-distant future, said Rabbi Charach, there won't be any reason for his services. "The future of this town is that one day people will remember there was a Jewish presence here."

Carol Kassel and Chuck Gold are co-chairs of the 1996 United Jewish Appeal Campaign. They recently led a mission to Ukraine and Israel.

Coming to terms with sacrifice



By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

The story of Pinchas, Aaron's grandson, is read this month. Pinchas takes a stand against Israel's pagan worship, slaying an Israelite man and a Midianite woman. God rewards him and rabbinic literature ascribes to him the Divine Spirit. Surely a man who defends the honor of the Almighty to this extent should live a life of greatness.

Such is not the case. The rabbis introduce Pinchas again later in his life, in the story of Jephtah and his daughter. Pinchas is the high priest at that time, but he fails to avert the disaster of Jephtah's daughter.

In the time of the Judges, Jephtah, an army general, vows that if victorious in battle he will sacrifice to God the first "thing" that comes to greet him. His daughter leads the parade to greet Jephtah and it is she who must be sacrificed to fulfil his vow.

The obvious problem of human sacrifice nags at every reader. We are taught that Abraham offering Isaac on the altar is the turning point where God teaches that human sacrifice must end. Yet generations later, we find an Israelite leader offering his daughter on the altar, and not even the high priest intervenes.

How has history judged Jephtah and Pinchas and how we can read the silent complicity of Jephtah's daughter?

Lowest point of Pinchas' life

The rabbis see this incident as the lowest point of Pinchas' life. The first episode merits him the Divine Spirit but this episode strips him of it. According to the midrash, both Jephtah and Pinchas seek a way out of the predicament. Yet each one feels it is the place of the other to make the journey and ask for help.

Jephtah feels that since he is the general it is beneath him to beg for help from the religious figure. Pinchas feels that since Jephtah needs his help, he should come and ask. Neither one can overcome his ego, the vow is not nullified and Jephtah's daughter is lost. As a result, Pinchas loses his Divine connection and Jephtah's bones are scattered. But what of Jephtah's daughter?

There are two stories dealing with human sacrifice among the Hebrews, one involving Isaac, the other Jephtah's daughter. The parallels in the stories are striking: both are victims of their fathers, and both are willing particiants.

The rabbis do not read Isaac as passive on the altar. He cautions his father not to let the knife slip, thereby wounding him and disqualifying him as a pure sacrifice. The rabbis likewise state that Jephtah's daughter goes to the high court and proves she is a pure sacrifice. Both children trust their fathers and commit themselves wholeheartedly to their fates.

In modern times, Jephtah's daughter is seen as the ultimate victim, the passive, uneducated daughter. But the midrash reads her as parallel to Isaac. She is not passive, she is not uneducated, but alas in a world of politics and ego, she does become the ultimate victim.

Crown attorney crusades for gay rights

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In the 1890s, novelist Emile Zola rocked the French establishment with his article, J'accuse, charging them with conspiracy in the case of Alfred Dreyfuss.

A hundred years later, Toronto Crown attorney Michael Leshner borrowed Zola's writing style and crusading spirit to pen an article challenging senior Canadian politicians on what he considers a fundamental issue of human rights.

"I accuse Jean Chrétien. I accuse Bob Rae, Lynn McLeod, Mike Harris," Leshner wrote in a recent Toronto newspaper article.

"There is hate in the land" and the victims are homosexuals, he continued.

An avowed gay rights activist, Leshner has taken up the cudgels to push for equal treatment for gays and lesbians in every aspect of life. He has challenged discriminatory government policies in court and won, and has spoken out for a minority he says suffers "blatant, apartheid-like discrimination."

Leshner, 47, gained national exposure in 1992, when a board of inquiry ruled unanimously that same-sex couples employed by the civil service were entitled to the same employee and survivor benefits as heterosexual couples.

Since he launched that case to get equal treatment for himself and his partner of 14 years, Mike Stark, he has taken a very public, activist stand.

Leshner credits his Jewish heritage and the debt he owes his grandparents for helping push him into the public arena. "Jews since World War II have told us it is important to be righteous and to stand up to discrimination," he said.

"That's why I speak out. I feel that I honor my grandparents who fled Eastern Europe because of poverty and discrimination ... I honor their memories by standing up to the Cossack-like mentality in our midst. When it's aimed against gays, it's the equivalent to anti-Semitism," because hatred and discrimination against gays is based on their personal characteristics.

"I don't see any moral or legal difference between anti-Semitism, racism or homophobia," he said.

One of five brothers, Leshner grew up in a traditional, kosher Jewish home in St. Catharines, attended afternoon Jewish school and went to synagogue on holidays.

In 1976, he was hired as a Crown attorney and in 1983, he attended a Crown Christmas party with his partner. "No one said anything," he recalls.

Michael Leshner

He said his parents, who now live in Miami, have been supportive of the relationship.

He believes an older brother, who married a gentile woman 30 years ago, paved the way for him. His parents, who objected to the marriage, learned they couldn't prevent it. Any objections they raised only served to poison the family relationship, Leshner said.

Leshner has some unkind words for the organized Jewish community and for synagogues.

"The Jewish community ... has rightly lectured the rest of the world that the Holocaust occurred because the world did not stand up to hate. I've internalized that message. But when you see where my Jewish allies are on homophobia, they've stayed on the sidelines."

Canadian Jewish leaders have told him that "faultlines" in the community prevent Jewish organizations from taking a concerted stand on so divisive an issue.

"What particularly offends me is that same sex couples who want to raise their children as members of a synagogue are turned away," he said.

Leshner credits the Holy Blossom Temple for reaching out to homosexuals at a recent community event.

Auction action for Beit Halochem

By AMY SATTIN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Whether you call them foolish or fearless, 26 men and women strutted their stuff before 600 strangers to raise money for charity earlier this month.

The Night of a Thousand Stars bachelor/bachelorette auction, organized by Beit Halochem Canada, raised $25,000 for disabled veterans in Israel.

Bidders could choose date packages that ranged from outdoor treats to downtown chic. Most packages fetched between $150 and $200, with the highest bid of the evening at $600.

The 18 men and seven women participants were drawn from all age groups and professions. "We took anyone who came," admitted organizer Roberta Pludwinski. "The only stipulation was they had to be single — and have the guts."

It did take courage to parade in front of the large and restless crowd, but as participant Joel Clodman, 42, put it: "It takes a lot more chutzpah to go on the line for Israel."

Beit Halochem provides rehabilitation and social programs for injured soldiers and their families through three centres in Israel. The Canadian organization raised $750,000 in 1994.

Ten visiting veterans were on hand for the auction, as was 37-year-old Avi Fridman, who came to Toronto last month for corrective orthopedic surgery at Mount Sinai Hospital.

Fridman, whose left leg was shattered by shrapnel in a 1979 special mission, told The CJN he considers the local Beit Halochem centre in Jerusalem his second home.

"You need just a little support, that's all," said the father of three.

Community youth gather for weekend kallah

CALEDON VILLAGE, Ont. — Fifty-four youngsters from Ontario small communities recently participated in a weekend kallah (gathering) here.

The kallah at Caledon Hills Leisure Village was part of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region's High School Outreach Program. Participants included 30 teenagers taking part in the current education program, as well as the alumni who had completed the three-year program last year.

Lea Kon, 13, of Guelph, who was attending her second kallah, said, "It was great that the alumni spent time with us and helped show us the ropes."

Kon, whose sister Deborah, 18, took part in the previous program, said she decided to join even though she attends Hebrew school. "I want to explore my Jewish roots and learn even more. And it's great to be able to spend time with Jewish young adults."

Congress' Ontario region is committed to preserving and strengthening Jewish life in 30 communities around the province, ranging in size from one to 250 families. Identifying the need for Jewish education and continuity in these communities, CJC launched the outreach program, which is now in its fourth three-year cycle.

Students learn by correspondence from material sent out by Congress and from periodic visits by staffers. Twice yearly, the teenagers come together for group study. The program culminates with five weeks of study and travel in Israel.

At this kallah, the focus was on pre-Holocaust Jewish history and culture in eastern Europe. Kon found the role-playing games especially enlightening, particularly one regarding shtetl life.

Sarah Chalmers, 14, of Peterborough said she was skeptical at first about participating in the program, but thus far "it has been a fun experience. As well, it has been an eye-opener, especially learning about the history of anti-Semitism."

She also particularly enjoyed the interactive games, "especially Coming to America, which taught us how difficult it was for Jews not only to leave a country, but to receive permission to enter a new nation. I can't believe what Jews had to go through."

In addition to Jackson and Cartman, others assisting at the kallah were Ontario region education consultant Gary Levine, Sarah Bergson, Josh Ross (of Halifax), Jeff Carpino, Kathy Axmith, Andrea Luca, Janna Cohen and Simon Rucker.

ASSOCIATED BRANCH DEDICATED

Members of the Kamin family came together recently for the official dedication of the Atkinson branch of Associated Hebrew Schools, to be called the Jack and Buschie Kamin Eduation Centre. Seen (from left) are Loren Bornstein, Paul Kamin, Buschie Kamin, Dr. Robert Chelin, Michael Kamin and Amy Kamin. The branch, opened in January, will house over 1,000 students this September.

NCSY scholarship to help with yeshivah study

HUNTSVILLE, Ont. — A special scholarship fund was set up by the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) in memory of one of its members at a recent regional convention.

Over 180 high school students from Toronto, Thornhill, Richmond Hill, Montreal, Ottawa, Kitchener, Trenton, Paris and London gathered in celebration of renewed commitment to Jewish values and lifestyle.

The highlight of the weekend celebration was the annual awards banquet where over 100 of the participants were honored for their personal commitment to Jewish continuity.

Thirty-one of those received scholarships ranging from $700 to $1,000 to enable them to spend a year studying at Jewish institutions of higher learning in Israel. These scholarships were made possible through the support of Stephen and Ruth Rosen of Thornhill, Leibel and Gayle Wolfe of Montreal, Dr. Harvey and Sharon Erlich of Toronto, Lawrence and Susan Zeifman of Thornhill and Rabbi and Mrs. Baruch Taub of Thornhill.

As well, a scholarship fund was set up in the name of Michael Cherniack to give NCSY members a year of study at a yeshivah in Israel.

Michael, who recently died at age 24, is the son of Laurie and Debbie Cherniack. The family has been supporters of NCSY Canada for many years. Laurie was the past regional vice-president of the Orthodox Union.

Recipients of the Michael Cherniak Award were Marni Katz, Teri Rothenberg, Shai Scherer, Avi Poch and Shira Rapp.

CJN Rosh Hashanah Photo Contest

The CJN announces its Rosh Hashanah photo contest. We are asking our readers to submit photographs either of Israel or of any Jewish theme in their communities. They must be original photos taken by the reader.

Who can enter:
Anyone can enter except CJN employees or members of their family.

How to enter:
A maximum of three photos per entrant may be submitted. Please place your name, address and phone number on the back of each photo. We can only return the photos if you provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. We cannot be responsible however for any photos lost in the mail.

You may mail or deliver your photos to:
CJN Rosh Hashanah Contest, The Canadian Jewish News, 10 Gateway Blvd., Suite 420, Don Mills, Ontario, M3C 3A1.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on August 18, 1995.

Prizes:
The judges will choose the three photographs which, in their opinion, are most evocative.

The winning submissions will be published in The CJN Rosh Hashanah issue. In addition, each of the winners will receive a cheque for $100.

We will undoubtedly receive many worthy submissions. But only three will be selected as the winners. We will also select other photographs for publication as honorable mentions. The decisions of the judges will be final. The odds of winning depend upon the number and the quality of submissions received.

How the winners will be notified:
Winning entrants will be notified by telephone before the start of the Shabbat on Friday, August 25.

When the prizes will be awarded:
The winning photos will be published in The CJN of Sept. 21.

We look forward to receiving your submissions. May the camera's eye capture the stirrings of your heart. Good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Youth prepare to take part in 'Israel Experience'

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A group of about 60 Torontonians who will be making aliyah shortly are embarking on "the ultimate Israel experience," said one speaker at their farewell reception.

"Israel Experience" has become the catch-all phrase to describe all sorts of organized programs for Diaspora Jews — mainly youth — going to Israel.

"We all need to work together and maximize the role of Israel in our lives," said Lorraine Sandler, chair of the recently formed Israel Experience committee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto. The federation, along with the Israel Aliyah Centre and the Canadian Zionist Federation (CZF), co-sponsored the reception, held at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

The event was the final meeting in a series of seven organized by Toronto's aliyah shaliach, Udi Savion. Previous meetings, designed to minimize culture shock following aliyah, focused on diverse aspects of day-to-day life in Israel.

Approximately 200 people are making aliyah this year through Savion's office, which serves Ontario and Manitoba. An additional 45 people are making aliyah through the Vancouver office, and about 140 from Montreal. (Numbers are about 10 per cent higher than last year.)

Reception guests were treated to an Israeli song and dance presentation by Niurim, a Youth & Hechalutz group. The presentation, featuring a number of familiar Hebrew tunes, was choreographed by Rivka Atzmony. Musical direction was by Doron Ophir, and the presentation was coordinated by Tami Savion.

"You won't hear a lot of those songs any more in Israel," noted Herzl Makov, Montreal-based representative of the CZF to Canada. "The culture, the atmosphere, everything has changed in Israel — as it should. It's a growing country, a prospering country."

Bayla Goldman, a thirtyish dancer/choreographer who is finalizing her aliyah plans, agrees with Makov's assessment. "Within the last five years, the development in Israel's dance community is almost equal to Toronto's," she told The CJN.

Goldman spent a year in Israel when she was in her mid-20s and returned for a recent pilot trip to investigate job opportunities. She credits the Aliyah Centre as an information resource.

A publicity-shy married couple who made aliyah two years ago described their experience during the formal part of the evening. Their aliyah has been "interesting, rewarding and ... frustrating, but a wonderful learning and growing experience.

"We discovered that what seemed perfectly normal to us was totally crazy to a person of a different culture. We have learned a lot about patience."

Despite the difficulties, the woman said aliyah was "a dream come true. The longer we're there, the more we're sure we made the right decision."

Makov commended the departing olim for pursuing their dreams. "We are living in a very materialistic world. We deserve and our children deserve some [idealism]."

Other speakers included Avrom Gossack, president, CZF, central region; and Moshe Tal, director, Western Aliyah division of the World Zionist Organization.

Jewish high school to open in Ottawa

By MIRIAM SOBEL
CJN Correspondent

OTTAWA — It was just over a dozen years ago when Neima Langner and her husband Richard Davies, both young doctors, considered settling in Ottawa where Richard had been offered a cardiology residency at the Ottawa Civic Hospital Institute.

While the city met most of their requirements — a thriving Jewish community and proximity to family in Montreal — it did not have a Jewish day school beyond Grade 8.

But their first child was just a baby. Surely, they thought, by the time he is ready for high school, there will be one.

And they were right. What they didn't know was that Langner and a group of other parents would be the ones to get it off the ground.

Since late January, when the Jewish Community Council approved funding for the school, provided a minimum of 10 students signed up, Langner and the rest of the steering committee have recruited students, hired staff, developed a curriculum, planned fundraising projects and searched for a building.

Ottawa's as yet nameless Jewish high school is set to open in September, in time to welcome Langner's son and 10 classmates to Grade 9. There will also be a Grade 10 class of four students.

"There are a million details to work out when putting together a whole school," says Langner, who will chair the school's board. "It can't be ragged at the edges when it opens in September."

"It's been exhilarating, challenging, frustrating and aggravating all at the same time," says Paul Bregman, a founding member who is in charge of fundraising and finances. "We're talking about Jewish parents and their most prized possessions, their children."

Organizers say they are excited about the quality of the school and the curriculum.

The school principal is Ian Macdonald, retired principal of Lisgar Collegiate, known for its high academic standards. Rabbi Howard Finkelstein will coordinate the Jewish Studies program. The rest of the staff are top-notch teachers, says Langner, an advantage of hiring at a time of teacher surpluses.

Because of the small student body, teachers will be able to be innovative and take advantage of community resources like the National Library and work settings. Some view the school as a classroom without walls.

The core of Jewish studies will a theme-based analysis of Jewish texts in Hebrew and Aramaic. During the school's first year, students will study writings about community and the way people treat each other. They will begin with Torah, and go on to study Talmud and the great commentaries, learning both text skills and the way Jewish writings apply to modern issues.

The goal of the program, says Langner, is to give Jewish kids an appreciation and knowledge of their intellectual heritage.

"The teenage years are the time when you can influence kids for the rest of their lives," says Bregman. "They want to know about their heritage. This is when they question their history and their lives."

His son Bram says he is looking forward to going to the school.

"I'd rather be with fellow Jews than with kids I've never met," he says.

He admits though, that not all his classmates are as enthusiastic. It isn't easy being a pioneer, especially when many of your friends are moving on to big secular high schools.

Mindful of their children's social needs, parents will be planning extracurricular activities and get-togethers with other Jewish teens.

But Langner has no doubt that the school's small size will be temporary. "It's hard to say how big [the school] will grow but we certainly expect it to grow very quickly once people see the quality of education that goes on there."

Laniado Hospital founder honored

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Rabbi Yekutiel Yehuda Halberstam, the late Sanz Klauzenberg rebbe, was badly hurt during a Nazi forced march, he bandaged himself up using a twig and rags. He was too afraid to trust Nazi doctors.

He made a pledge, said Rabbi Yerachmiel Milstein, executive vice-president of American Friends of Laniado Hospital, "to build a hospital so that no one would ever be afraid to seek medical help."

He made good on his pledge. The Sanz Medical Centre and Laniado Hospital, in Netanya now serves over 220,000 area residents, and includes a nursing school, environmental and occupational health department, a geriatric centre, a premature baby unit and a trauma centre.

The accomplishments of the rebbe, the hospital and its first medical director, Torontonian Dr. Joseph Weil, were celebrated at a dinner held recently at Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation in Thornhill.

Guest speaker Israel Singer, executive director of the World Jewish Congress, praised Rabbi Halberstam and other Holocaust survivors for rebuilding Jewish life from the vacuum left by Hitler's slaughter.

Rabbi Halberstam recognized, he said, that, while the good in modernity can and should be harnessed, "without Torah, comes lack of ethics. Science will rule us."

Slamming those who call themselves "central Orthodox," he said that "there is no longer room for fence sitters. There is no middle road — that only means that 54 per cent of Jews will assimilate."

He charged that "we have a massive behemoth of unplanned, disorganized, chaotic organizations, dispersing money without any kind of plan."

Money must be found to properly educate every Jewish child, he said, noting that that means $7,000 to $10,000 per child. The only new source of funds, he said, is from restitution and reparations, which he called "trying to right the wrongs of past years.

"I am unforgiving," he said. "Entire nations owe Jews restitution, and I will make sure they [pay up] until I get tired of asking.

"Jews didn't die so that the president of Hungary or the president of Poland could be their heirs."

Adding that those once behind the Iron Curtain are now eligible for reparations as well, he promised "every hospital, every Jewish school, every survivor will be helped by this money — especially in Israel."

Rabbi Yitzhak Kerzner, spiritual leader of Clanton Park Synagogue, praised the late Dr. Joseph Weil as one for whom medicine was not just a means of livelihood, but "a mission, a calling.

Rabbi Kerzner presented Weil's widow, Hilda, with a plaque marking the dedication of the new Dr. Joseph Weil Memorial Wing.

Maccabi Ontario readies for upcoming games

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

Maccabi Ontario's newly-installed executive includes, (top row, standing, from left) Joe Levy, Colin Cooper, Ira Kuchinsky, David Blumer, David Phillips, Alek Korn, Lynne Cipin, Gord Garshowitz, Alan Gerskup and Jack Rotsztain. Seated (from left) Art Kraus, Frank Wilson and Harold Cipin. Not shown, Howard Kornblum.

TORONTO — Like long dormant perennials that blossom early in the spring, the Maccabi Ontario organization is back in full bloom.

And just in time, too.

The newly-installed executive has its hands full preparing provincial contingents for the upcoming Youth Games scheduled for August in Long Island, N.Y.

After that, organizers have their sights set on the eighth Pan American Maccabi Games in Buenos Aires, which begin in December.

The "new and aggressive team" has been in place for several months, said chair Frank Wilson, with a multi-pronged mandate to raise the organization's profile in the community, raise funds for various projects and re-orient Maccabi into a member-based organization.

In the past, Maccabi would appear periodically to raise money and send athletes to regional or international competitions. The new Maccabi Ontario will be permanent, as in other parts of the world, where Maccabi is a year-round membership organization.

Memberships would be on individual, family or corporate bases. Athletes wishing to represent Canada or Ontario at competitions would have to first join the club, Wilson suggested. It is still in the planning stages.

Meanwhile, Maccabi Ontario is co-operating with the Bloor Jewish Community Centre in Toronto to send a joint team to the upcoming Youth Games.

Maccabi organizers have also met with representatives of Toronto's Bathurst Jewish Centre to discuss a number of issues: creating an alliance to train young athletes; relocating Maccabi's resource centre, named for philanthropist Irv Ungerman; and moving the championship trophies into the front lobby.

Maccabi organizers are holding a fundraising dinner Oct. 30 to honor the Toronto Raptors basketball team.

Although not a member of the Maccabi executive in the past, Wilson has served in a number of community volunteer positions. He is a director of the Jewish National Fund in Toronto and is a past vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada. His father, Heinz "The Highway" Wertheim, was Germany's top marathoner in the mid-1930s, but Nazi policies prevented him from representing Germany at the 1936 Olympic Games.

Lexchin elite milliner

TORONTO — Milliner Elsie Lexchin, whose stylish creations graced the heads of Toronto's elite, died May 28 in Toronto. She was 92.

The Russian-born Lexchin learned hat making in Detroit in the 1920s. She opened her first boutique on College Street after the war, and was one of the first high-end merchants in Yorkville when she moved to Cumberland Avenue in the 1960s.

The feather, fur and cloth hats — each coming in a distinct black-and-gold hat box — were worn by the wives and daughters of prominent politicians and businessmen. "Nobody ever had the same hat," said niece Doreen Silverstone.

Anshei Minsk Synagogue a reminder of life in Jewish Kensington Market

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

Inside the Anshei Minsk Synagogue.

TORONTO — In the heart of Kensington Market, surrounded by Portuguese, Caribbean and Chinese shops and cafes, stands Anshei Minsk Synagogue, a palpable reminder of the years when this was a distinctly Jewish enclave.

The Minsker shul, a tall, buff brick building, has wide steps leading up to the main sanctuary. Inside, under a domed ceiling, stained glass windows diffuse a soft rainbow over polished dark wood. Gilded paintings flank the bimah.

The shul is now being considered for designation as a heritage building.

The congregation was founded in 1913 when a few local people met in a neighborhood home. Construction on the building, designed by architects Kaplan and Sprachman, began in 1920 and was completed in 1930.

Anshei Minsk was thriving until the Jewish population began moving north. Even then, the shul continued to draw men who worked in the garment trade on "The Avenue" — Spadina.

But as the clothing business changed, support for the shul dwindled and the congregation decreased, until the Jewish Educational Program (JEP), which has a link with Anshei Minsk, became involved.

In 1988, Rabbi Shmuel Spero, then in his early 30s, was brought from Cleveland. He reached out to singles and young people, without neglecting longtime members.

"Though we're Orthodox," he says, "everyone feels comfortable here."

Three years ago, Renee and Moe Wortzman brought their daughter to be named at Anshei Minsk. They had been searching for a shul with the traditions and "feeling" Renee recalled from B'nai Israel in her hometown, St. Catharines.

She is now sisterhood president, and she and Moe have become "den parents" to the singles who attend the shul. Young families are beginning to join.

The shul's weekly Friday night Shabbatons offer a means of helping "form a deeper connection to Judaism," says Rabbi Spero, as well as a time to socialize and form relationships.

After school Torah classes for youngsters and an adult Kabbalah study group are now offered. And there are weddings, bar mitzvahs, holiday celebrations and special events.

Anshei Minsk, Wortzman says, is the only downtown synagogue offering a daily minyan. She notes that the shul is convenient to hospitals and hotels.

The congregation has grown to almost 200. The hall where much of the daily activity is centred has been freshened and a mural by artist Ian Leventhal has been added.

Synagogue president is Dr. Mel Litman. Cantor for the past 42 years is Ruben Schwebel.

Carabram to feature Aelita

TORONTO — Well-known singer Aelita will produce and headline the stage show at the Israel Pavilion at Carabram.

Carabram, Brampton's annual multicultural festival, will be held this year from July 7 to 9. The 50 families of the city's Har Tikvah synagogue organize the Israel Pavilion every year, and last year won three of the four top prizes.

Aelita

Aelita, who sings in 14 languages, will perform in Hebrew, Yiddish, Russian and English, recreating, she told The CJN, "the sounds, the camaraderie, the vibrant joie de vivre that characterizes the people and the lifestyle in Israel."

A cast of dancers and musicians will take part in the show, which will feature authentic Israeli songs and dances, both modern and traditional.

The Israel Pavilion features a scenic walkway which includes three life-sized dioramas (including a camel), huge hand painted murals of the principal cities of Israel and a market bazaar offering handcrafts and exported products from Israel.

In Ziva's Kitchen, you can enjoy the tastes and aromas of such Jewish delicacies as lox and bagels, falafel, blintzes, latkes and mouthwatering desserts.

The bar offers Israeli beer and wines, Sabra liqueur and Canadian beer and pop.

The Carabram Israel Pavilion is at Heart Lake Secondary School, 292 Conestoga Dr., Brampton. For more information, call Aelita at 416-222-7573.

Olmert wants talks to begin

[Cont'd. from page 1]

Reacting to news that the PLO intends to establish its own city council in East Jerusalem, he declared: "I'm not impressed. The PLO doesn't have the formal powers to do that. If [the PLO] violates the law, we will enforce the law."

He added: "Some people may be indicted. We'll have to take action."

Could this not lead to an international incident? "So what? If the world chooses to react to this, we'll cope with it."

Olmert urged the government to immediately close several PLO institutions in East Jerusalem which were opened in violation of the 1993 Declaration of Principles.

"Some of these institutes outrageously contravene the Oslo accord. I understand the government will close them."

Ehud Olmert

Olmert described PLO chairman Yasser Arafat as "a bad [negotiating] partner."

Complaining that Arafat has not fully kept his commitments, Olmert said Arafat has neither controlled terrorism nor cancelled the PLO's national covenant, which calls for Israel's destruction.

The Oslo process, he observed, will not "bring down Israel, but it's a very negative development which I regret."

Olmert suggested that if the Likud wins the next election, it will re-examine Israel's strategy at the peace talks.

"The PLO will have to come to terms with the government of the day," he observed. "I don't remember it was written in the Bible that there is only one way to negotiate."

Likud, he said, has a good chance of unseating the Labor party "if we're smart and responsible."

David Levy's defection from the Likud, he said, is insignificant. "It will have no outcome on the election."

Marx to conduct review of CJC election bylaws

The commission membership will also be kept small. "If it's a 20-person group, I don't think anything will get done," she said.

Hecht praised the choice of Marx as chair, but said anything less than an "independent" review of this past election would be "whitewashing the past."

The last plenary — which he describes as a balagan — "left Congress facing a very fragmented, hurt Jewish community," he said. Hecht insisted that he is not seeking an annulment of the results, even though he feels the process was biased against him.

He said he may make a submission, if asked, to the commission.

The bylaws are not precise enough and open to too wide an interpretation, he said.

Hecht's personal preference is "one Jew, one vote," with all members of the Jewish community being eligible to vote right in their own city. As for the difficulty of determining 'who is a Jew,' Hecht is confident this could be worked out. "All societies set rules for eligibility to vote."

Arizona still a cowboy's home

By ANITA SZABADI-GOTTESMAN
Special to The CJN

Maple trees are second nature to us. Palm trees seem somewhat familiar to Florida snowbirds and California dreamers but come face to face with a Saguaro (pronounced suh-wah-ro) cactus and life will never seem the same!

These majestic carnegiea gigantea or giant cacti line the streets as you drive through Phoenix. These cacti can grow 50 to 60 feet in height. They are found only in the Sonoran desert in central and southern Arizona. The Saguaro's large white blossom is Arizona's state flower.

The desert air, sweet as a soft breeze, combines with clear blue skies and brilliant sunshine — welcome to Arizona! I now know why Arizona is fast becoming one of the most travelled winter destinations. And I haven't even mentioned the golf courses! Renowned as a golfer's paradise, many hotels and resorts are located on beautifully groomed golf courses that stretch far into the desert.

Despite the modern surroundings, Arizona is still a cowboy's home. Beautiful horses and cattle roam free on large ranches just outside the city. Each year, Scottsdale hosts the world's largest Arabian horse show.

Many hotels and resorts are located on former ranch sites such as the famous McCormick Ranch Resort. A full range of accommodations are available in Phoenix and the suburbs of Scottsdale located just north east of the city.

Favored by Canadians

Scottsdale is a self-contained resort area favored by Canadians for its golf courses and tennis court on every corner set-up. Restaurants and beautiful shopping malls complete the picture.

However, the best way to appreciate your surroundings is to rent a car and drive into the desert. On our first drive around dusk one evening, we were astounded by the beautiful desert homes nestled in rock and sand beds surrounded by many different types of cacti. As we turned a corner, two coyotes sauntered past the car out for an evening stroll. Around the next bend, we had to brake quickly as a jackrabbit bounded across the road.

It's also worth the drive two hours north to Sedona. This artist's colony is hidden among the famed Arizona red rocks. Jeep tours are available that take you into the rock formations. The vistas and views are not to be missed. For the less adventuresome, Sedona's numerous art galleries provide a fascinating look at Arizona's many Indian nations which still thrive today.

I was truly impressed by Arizona's hospitality, the range of facilities available and the cleanliness of the entire Phoenix/Scottsdale corridor — but mostly by what nature has blessed Arizona with, which is available for all to enjoy.

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

On Tuesday evening of last week, there were two items in the vicinity of Pearson Airport's Gate 103 that seemed easily capable of lifting off from the ground.

One of them was an Air Canada B-767-300 parked on the tarmac. The sleek, extended-range jetliner was about to achieve a milestone of sorts by flying direct from Toronto to Tel Aviv on the inaugural run of Air Canada's new twice-weekly Flight 884.

Also appearing ready to fly was Ruth Ben-Tzur — the usually terrestrial director of the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO) in Toronto — who seemed as buoyant as the helium balloons decorating the terminal for the special occasion. For a few moments, at least, Travel Talk was practically convinced that she was going to float right up to the ceiling.

Ruth Ben Tzur

"I feel like it's my wedding, or maybe that I'm giving birth — that's the feeling," said the ebullient IGTO chief, who has worked hard over her three years in Canada to make more flight options available for Canadians travelling to Israel.

There was music in the air as well as the aroma of freshly-cooked falafel. As singer Shelly Ovdat and her accompanist performed ballads about Jerusalem, passengers of Flight 884 stood in line to receive complimentary kosher falafels. And who knows? Curious passengers awaiting flights to London, Zurich and Hong Kong at nearby gates probably queued for falafels as well.

"Would you believe in Pearson Airport, an Israel celebration like this?" Ben-Tzur asked, glowing as she swept a hand over the usually subdued, businesslike Terminal 2. "With pictures of Israel all over the walls? Israeli songs? Falafels? Orange juice? It's like a dream come true."

Although Ben-Tzur is a strong supporter of Israel's national airline, El Al, she believes even more strongly in free enterprise and the right of the travelling public to have as many choices as possible for air travel. Before Air Canada's entry into the Middle Eastern market via Flight 884, El Al was the only airline offering direct flights from Canada to Israel.

"It's easier than ever before to get to Israel, and prices have dropped by 40 per cent — yes, that's what I said, 40 per cent — since Air Canada entered the market," Ben-Tzur said. "It's cheap now! Listen, you can't convince people to buy a product if they think it's expensive, and you can't force them to buy from only one source. They want a choice, they want good service and they want value for their dollar. And all this they're getting now."

There were speeches — short and sweet — after which Ben-Tzur and Air Canada senior vice-president Robert Milton jointly cut a red ribbon. Flight announcements for 884 were made in English, French — and Hebrew, an Air Canada first. Music played as passengers began to board; a woman danced briefly with a ticket-taker near the gate. The pilot, Capt. Wayne MacLellan, confided to a few well-wishers that he was quite excited because he had never been to Israel before.

More speeches and celebrations awaited passengers at the other end of the flight. They were reportedly greeted by Canadian ambassador Norman Spector and invited to a reception at his home the following evening for Alberta Premier Ralph Klein, who reached the Promised Land a few days earlier in the company of a trade delegation from Western Canada. The delegation — and probably some passengers aboard Flight 884 — were to attend a Canada-Israel free trade symposium the next day.

Air Canada executive vice-president and CEO Jean-Jacques Bourgeault told Travel Talk that a surprising proportion of those aboard Flight 884 consisted of American travellers.

"About 25 per cent of the people flying tonight are Americans connecting in Toronto from San Francisco, Los Angeles, Chicago, Miami," he said. "A lot of people are telling us we have a schedule that is extremely convenient for them."

Clearly, Air Canada officials are hoping the flight from Toronto to Tel Aviv — as well as its return, which involves selling Israelis on the joys of travel to Canada — will continue to be as popular as early indications show. If things go well, the airline may soon offer a direct flight from Montreal, possibly via a European gateway such as Paris.

Another reception was scheduled for Air Canada's inaugural return flight from Israel to Canada. Watch this space to see whether Ruth Ben-Tzur begins to float heavenward.

Israel, Alberta ink economic cooperation treaty

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — Alberta Premier Ralph Klein signed an economic cooperation treaty with Israel here last week.

The agreement will focus on energy, technology and ecological trade — and should boost Alberta-Israel trade, which totalled less than $20 million in 1994.

Alberta business leaders who accompanied Klein on the trade mission concluded deals with Israeli companies amounting to at least $16 million.

Klein, who was accompanied by Alberta Minister of Federal and Intergovernmental Affairs Ken Rostad, addressed several business forums in Israel and paid a courtesy call to Palestinian Authority chairman Yasser Arafat in Gaza.

The premier also signed a memorandum of understanding that will promote joint research and development projects between Alberta and Israeli firms under the auspices of the Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation (CIIRDF). Under this scheme, the Alberta and Israeli governments agree to assume 50 per cent of the R&D costs of approved joint ventures in the private sector.

Earlier this month, Atlantic Canada signed a similar agreement with Israel.

"These agreements will promote Israel in areas where the country does not have a high profile," said Dr. Henri Rothschild, president of the CIIRDF, the year-old program modelled after the successful U.S.-Israel Binational R&D (BIRD).

Rothschild noted that of the eight Canadian-Israeli partnerships already approved by the CIIRDF, six involve Ontario firms. The Alberta and Atlantic Canada agreements will also provide additional funding to the CIIRDF, which used up two-thirds of its three-year ($6-million) budget in its first year.

In other trade news, Canada and Israel expect to sign and implement a free trade agreement (FTA) by Jan. 1, 1996, said Zohar Peri, head of the Israeli negotiating team. The next round of talks, scheduled to wind up in July, will determine whether that goal can be met, said Peri, speaking at a symposium held in Tel Aviv last week to explore the implications of such an agreement.

The main stumbling blocks are in the areas of agriculture and "rules of origin" of textiles and electronic devices, said Peri. Canada's insistence that all components of electronic devices be made in Israel to qualify under the FTA would have a detrimental effect on Israeli telecommunications exports, he said, explaining that standard components like printed circuits are made in Taiwan or the United States.

Despite this and other differences "there is strong will on both sides to finalize the agreement by Jan. 1," said Peri, the deputy director of the Israeli Ministry of Industry and Trade.

Canada-Israel trade amounted to only $260 million in 1994, but the signing of a free trade agreement is expected to boost this substantially.

Economics and Planning Minister Shimon Shetreet advised Canadian entrepreneurs to look towards Israel not only for bilateral trade, but as a regional centre for emerging markets. But he warned investors to be wary of Arab sensitivities.

"Don't think there is a new Middle East. The remnants of 100 years of conflict still exist. The Arab countries are wary of Israeli economic domination," he said, noting Israel's GNP is larger than that of all of its neighbors combined. "The most successful formula for trade is a triangular model with a Canadian, Israeli and Arab partner and an international title."

Shetreet said the most promising areas of trade in Israel and the Middle East are tourism, infrastructure, energy, water and agriculture. He cited several major Israeli infrastructure projects that require foreign expertise, including a Tel Aviv subway, a railroad system, a $1-billion dollar highway and a tunnel in the Carmel region.

THE END IN SIGHT

It may not be the average person's idea of fun, but in the Israeli army, you haven't really shown what you're made of until you participate in a long route march. Here, members of a parachute brigade complete a three-day, 100-kilometre march from Beit Lid, near Netanya, to Jerusalem. [Israenet photo]

Adultery in Canada County

The Bridges of Madison County, a recent best-seller and box office hit, reviews the turmoil of a woman who discovers true romantic love while her decent (but unsatisfying) husband and children are away on a vacation. I believe the heroine, "Francesca", is based on a character by the same name in "Francesca and Paolo". The apparitions of these two adulterous lovers appear in the second circle of the Inferno (Hell) in Dante's Divine Comedy. Both become inextricably bound to their partners for eternity, reminding each other of the guilt they feel for their conduct and the pleasure of the "lost bliss" they once enjoyed.

In both cases, Francesca's husband would have no problem obtaining a divorce in Canada almost immediately, without having to wait the normal one year of separation between them. However, unless Francesca admitted to adultery, it would be too expensive and time-consuming to prove her actions to a Court. It's much cheaper and more expedient to await the completion of the one year of separation. Moreover, if Francesca and her husband were separated but still living under one roof, then the one year could begin from the moment they began to live separate lives, even though they continued to reside together. Moving into separate bedrooms or even abstaining from relations could start the one year.

However, if both wanted a quick divorce, and one or the other was already dating someone else, then a simple admission in a written affidavit could lead to a quick divorce judgement.

The only obstacle to such a quick divorce would be the lack of any agreement or payment of child support. Many men have been refused a divorce judgement because no child support agreement or order was in place when the request was made, or because they have been in arrears in their child support payments.

Otherwise, adultery carries no legal stigma in Canadian courts. Francesca's chances of obtaining custody of children would not be affected by her conduct. Indeed, Courts are increasingly recognizing that neglected spouses often seek comfort outside their marriage when their husbands (or wives) are too busy at the office to meet their fundamental emotional needs. However, an adulterer cannot sue for divorce based upon his or her adulterous actions. Only the "offended" spouse can do that and shorten the waiting period.

Francesca has not achieved that luxury in Canadian law yet. She would still have to sit and brood for a year in Dante's hell, accompanied by Paolo or Robert Kincaid — a constant memory of painful choices.

Israel, PLO push to meet deadline

CJN Wire Services

JERUSALEM — Extensive negotiations will be held with the Palestinians this week in a "supreme effort" to reach an agreement by the July 1 target date, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres said last Sunday night.

In his talks with Palestinian Authority (PA) chairman Yasser Arafat in Gaza Sunday, Peres told reporters, the two had "narrowed the gaps" on the sensitive issue of IDF redeployment from Palestinian population centres in the territories.

But with only days left before the July 1 target date for Israeli and Palestinian negotiators to conclude an agreement on the next phase of Palestinian self-rule, violent clashes are threatening to torpedo the process:

• Israeli soldiers shot and killed two Palestinian students Sunday and wounded at least 50 others during a demonstration in Nablus, one of several in the territories. The clash occurred near Juneid Prison, after some 500 people had marched from An-Najah University to express solidarity with hunger-striking prisoners.

• Also Sunday, a suspected Islamic Jihad suicide bomber detonated an explosive-laden donkey cart near the Jewish enclave of Neve Dekalim in Gaza, wounding three Israeli soldiers.

• On Saturday, a group of infiltrators from Jordan crossed into Israel. One was captured, another was shot dead two hours later, and as of Sunday, the third was still at large. Military sources said they intended to attack a Jewish target.

With the prisoners' hunger strike spreading from jail to jail over the past week, the issue was believed to have topped the agenda of talks between Peres and Arafat.

The PA is demanding a large-scale release of prisoners under the second-phase agreement now being negotiated.

Peres said an Israeli ministerial committee on prisoner releases would convene before the end of the week to discuss the issue.

The only specific commitment Peres gave was that 10 female prisoners would be freed shortly.

Under the terms of the Cairo Agreement signed by Israel and the PLO in May 1994, Israel released about 5,000 of the 10,000 prisoners it held at the time.

An estimated 6,000 prisoners remain in jails in Israel and the West Bank. Some 3,000 belong to Hamas, about 2,500 to Al Fatah and the rest to smaller factions.

About 2,000 prisoners are reportedly participating in the hunger strike, which is entering its second week.

On Sunday, a member of the ministerial committee, Police Minister Moshe Shahal, said each prisoner's case would be reviewed — with the goal of releasing prisoners — "without blood on their hands" — who were sick, old or had served most of their sentence.

Political observers here predicted that many hundreds of prisoners would be freed if the second phase of the self-rule agreement were concluded.

Negotiators are struggling to reach agreement on this next phase, which is supposed to include a redeployment of Israeli troops in the West Bank, to be followed by Palestinian elections.

Peres and Arafat said progress had been made but some issues remained unresolved, among them, according to Palestinian sources, the extent of the proposed Israel Defence Force redeployment from major Palestinian centres in the West Bank.

Israel is still proposing an initial pullout from four towns: Nablus, Kalkilya, Jenin and Tulkarm, according to these sources.

The Palestinians, however, are still demanding that Ramallah and Bethlehem be included.

But Israel says bypass roads are not yet in place around these two key cities located north and south, respectively, of Jerusalem.

Israeli officials say Ramallah and Bethlehem would be part of a "further redeployment," which would take place after the elections, targeted for November.

The PA is demanding that Israel commit to a binding timetable for such further redeployment.

Israeli sources said Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin is likely to meet with Arafat before July 1 in an effort to bridge the gaps so that an agreement can be signed on or about the target date.

Land claim possible for Syrian territory

CJN Wire Services

TEL AVIV — Israel may hold the title to a large chunk of Syria, purchased a century ago by the French Jewish financier Edmond de Rothschild, a newspaper reported last Wednesday.

The area is about the size of the disputed Golan Heights, which Israel captured from Syria in 1967. Syria is demanding a total Israeli withdrawal from the strategic plateau in exchange for peace.

In 1892, Rothschild bought 20,000 acres of Arab-owned land between the Jordan River and Damascus, some of it in the Golan, The Globes financial daily said.

Jewish immigrants from Romania briefly settled there, but the territory was mostly leased to Arab sharecroppers and businessmen until newly-independent Syria confiscated it in 1946, the report said.

It said Rothschild appealed, but the case was never settled. In 1957, the deeds and any future claim to the area were transfered to the state of Israel.

The paper said Israel could demand compensation for the land, and use its claim on it to counter Syria's demand for a complete Golan pullout.

Foreign Ministry spokesman Yigal Palmor said the report was "interesting," but could not verify it. In any case, he said, land ownership claims were not relevant to the issue of sovereignty.

June 19:

• Kol Israel reported that chief of IDF intelligence Uri Seguy informed Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin in a private meeting that he had decided to resign from active service by the end of this week, one month earlier than planned. Seguy's request was said to be motivated by the fact that he was overlooked by the chief of staff to head the military mission in Washington negotiating with Syria.

• Davar reported that UN official Terje Larson, a Norwegian academic, told senior Foreign Ministry officials the economic situation and the general morale of Palestinians in the Gaza Strip has improved. Larsen is the senior UN official responsible for coordinating financial aid to the Palestinians.

June 20:

• Ha'aretz reported that the American investment bank Bankers Trust has purchased a 15 per cent share in Enigma Information Systems, considered by many analysts to be a world leader in electronic publishing.

• Speaking before the foreign affairs and security committee of the Knesset, chief of staff Amnon Shahak announced that the tour of duty for reservists in combat units will be reduced by nine days per year.

June 21:

• Foreign Minister Shimon Peres met in Amman with Jordanian Crown Prince Hassan to discuss the prince's upcoming visit to Israel and issues of joint concern in science, water, and agriculture. Peres' visit follows a visit to Amman earlier in the week by Member of Knesset and head of the Histadrut Haim Ramon.

• A Knesset sub-committee recommended to the prime minister that the storied Nahal unit of IDF be disbanded.

June 22:

• According to Maariv, Yasser Arafat plans to move from Gaza to Ramallah after the IDF pulls out of the West Bank city. The paper also reported that the city was expected to become the seat of the Palestinian Council after elections are convened.

June 23 :

• Katyusha rockets fired from south Lebanon fell in western Galilee killing one person and injuring at least eight. After the attack, Israeli warplanes struck back at Hezbollah bases in southern Lebanon. The attack occurred one week after a similar incident in which eight Israeli civilians were injured.

Falafels rise up against fast food

By MAURY KELMAN

With the flurry of activity and news emanating from Israel at all times, one sometimes misses the truly important issues, the ones that shape the country's identity. The latest snag in the peace talks, religious-secular tension over the closing of Jerusalem streets and constant coalition manoeuverings are clearly crucial topics, yet one recent story surely demanded more press than it received.

THE TEXTURE OF LIFE IN ISRAEL

I speak, of course, of the scoop that Israeli soldiers on patrol in southern Lebanon used their cellular phones to order pizza from northern Israel, meeting the deliverymen at the border to collect their precious pies. When queried about these reports, an Israeli army spokesperson replied, "The army is looking into this matter now."

I can envision the scene. Yuval and Nachman are riding in their jeep, checking for mines, terrorists and other pleasant surprises when suddenly Yuval cries out, "967-11-11, phone Pizza Metulla, hey, hey, hey."

Nachman, sensing the urgency of the matter, tries to placate Yuval. "Yuval," he says in his soft, army lieutenant voice, "we should probably finish our mission here now, but afterwards, I promise I'll order you a large pie with all the extras to go."

Yuval, though, is in no mood to wait. He whips out his new cellular phone, given to him by his anxious mother in order to call home three times a day, and dials the number.

"Hi, this is Yuval calling. I'd like to order a pie ... Ya, that's right — just like yesterday's. I'll meet you by the Pizza Fence in 30 minutes."

And off Yuval excitedly gallops, dodging land mines and, more dangerously, his superiors as he anticipates his little snack.

Passing his fellow soldiers, who munch on Burger King fries and Kentucky Fried Chicken, Yuval already begins to plan his next dinner order. "My oh my," he exclaims, "I never realized that army life was such a blast."

Cellular phones and pizza. It seems that no matter where you go in Israel, you'll find either. The really impressive Israelis munch on their pizza while speaking on their pelefone (wonderphone).

The image of the sun-drenched sandal-wearing kibbutznik spitting out sunflower seeds while singing pioneer folk songs has somewhat lost its resonance. In his stead is the slick businessman, stock market report in one hand, cellular phone in the other. No sunflower seeds for this jetsetter, thank you very much.

This pizza proliferation has been accompanied by a burgeoning burger bonanza. The Israeli heavyweight Burger Ranch has been forced to share its stake in hamburger heaven with McDonald's and Burger King. While McDonald's has yet to take the kosher plunge, the first ever kosher Burger King has opened in Jerusalem to an excited and hungry population.

Along with the continually expanding Domino's and Pizza Hut, Israel has now witnessed the infiltration of major world food players into its midst. While many, especially those in the financial sector, applaud the internationalization of the Israeli food sector, those in the falafel industry shudder at the opening of the newest Burger King or Pizza Hut outlet.

This writer has recently learned falafel store owners across Israel have secretly formed a new political party — FAT (Falafel Association for Tomorrow). With the support of true falafel lovers across Israel, FAT hopes to win at least 20 seats in the next election, holding the balance of power in the government. Their campaign includes some of the following resolutions:

Baby falafel allowance, entitling each child through his/her first 18 years to 12 falafels a month (falafels may be reinvested each month, generating compound falafels to be eaten on child's 18th birthday);

A halt to peace talks until falafel is declared Israel's national food, which will coincide with the transformation of all burger and pizza stores into chickpea greenhouses;

And the right of return to all banished falafel store owners.

When asked to respond to these rumors, my local falafel shop owner vehemently denied the accusations. While no customers were in sight, he seemed unconcerned by the threat of the new food competition.

"Ehhh, ehhh," he declared. "They won't last. these new places. It's not real food. Here I give real food, man's food, you know, the kind you eat with your hands. The pita, it should have holes in it, so the tehina drips all over you. And none of this clean business. No forks or spoons. we use our hands for everything. You'll see. The real Israeli will come back."

What will the future hold? Will Jew and Arab walk harmoniously together, pizza in one hand, falafel in the other? Will the burger and falafel learn to live side by side in mutual respect and tolerance? Or will FAT conquer its rivals, leading to the installation of a giant falafel at Ben-Gurion Airport, with tourists greeted by Israel's new mascot, Fred the Falafel singing Ode to the Falafel? Stay tuned for the next chapter of Falafel Wars.

Burg takes reins of WZO

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Avraham Burg has been officially elected chair of the World Zionist Organization (WZO).

The election came at last week's opening session of the Zionist General Council. The council is the supreme legislative body of the Zionist Congress, which convenes every four years.

The 192 delegates of the Zionist General Council voted unanimously for Burg, who has served as acting chair of the WZO/Jewish Agency for Israel since February.

Burg was also scheduled to be ratified as chair of the Jewish Agency this week. He is then expected to resign from his Labor Knesset seat.

In his inauguration speech, Burg called for the reorganization and restructuring of the two bodies that have been the central vehicles for Israel-Diaspora relations.

Burg repeated his slogan, "One People — One Body," leaving little doubt he was referring to a much talked-about merger between the organizations.

Such a plan would effectively close the WZO as an independent organization.

Today, the WZO, which promotes aliyah and Zionist activities, acts as an equal partner in the Jewish Agency, which spends more than $400 million annually on immigration and resettlement, and other social services in Israel.

The Jewish Agency's money comes from United Jewish Appeal and Keren Hayesod campaigns overseas.

The WZO receives its budget of roughly $30 million from an arrangement reached with the agency.

Burg assured delegates that any changes in the agency and WZO would come as a result of discussion, debate, compromise and consent.

His blueprint, called "Brit Am — the People's Covenant," which was distributed to delegates, spells out Burg's vision of the Israel-Diaspora relationship, which he feels needs a strong infusion of Jewish education.

Hungary to return seized property: PM

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — The prime minister of Hungary has assured Jewish leaders that religious property seized during World War II will be returned within a 10-year period.

The pledge was made earlier this month during Prime Minister Gyula Horn's visit to the United States.

The property includes Jewish schools and synagogues, said the World Jewish Congress' Elan Steinberg, who attended a meeting between Horn and WJC officials here.

Next month, the Hungarian government's working committee on restitution is scheduled to meet with Jewish representatives in Budapest, Steinberg said.

"Jewish property will be considered on an equal basis with the others," he said.

He added that by Sept. 30, a list of property to be returned would be finalized.

Compensation for religious property that cannot be returned would take place over a period of two decades.

Anti-Semitism in Poland on Clinton's agenda

CJN Wire Services

SAN FRANCISCO — U.S. President Bill Clinton was scheduled to meet here on Monday with Polish President Lech Walesa, who has been under fire for his delay in responding to an anti-Semitic sermon delivered in his presence.

The Zycie Warszawy newspaper in Warsaw quoted White House officials as saying Clinton had agreed to meet under one condition: He wanted to discuss anti-Semitism in Poland.

As a Nobel Peace Prize winner, Walesa was invited to attend the United Nations' 50th anniversary session in San Francisco. He had been hoping to meet there with Clinton.

But the White House had been noncommittal and there were reports Walesa might be snubbed because he had refused to condemn the anti-Semitic statements of his old friend, Rev. Henryk Jankowski.

After nearly two stormy weeks of protest over Rev. Jankowski's comments, Walesa issued a statement last week saying he opposed anti-Semitism and would not allow it while he was president. But he said he could not comment on Rev. Jankowski's statements.

At a June 11 Mass at St. Brygida in Gdansk, which Walesa attended, the priest said, "The Star of David is implicated in the swastika as well as in the hammer and sickle." Rev. Jankowski urged Poles to "wake up" to Jewish "dangers," adding, "We can no longer tolerate being governed by people who have not declared whether they come from Moscow or Israel."

Three days later, Rev. Jankowski issued a statement saying, "Jews, like all other people, happen to do unbecoming things in public life, just like they happen to do very noble things.

"I mean first of all their activities as bankers and financiers. A lot of human tragedy came as a result of these activities," the priest said.

Throughout, Walesa refused to repudiate Rev. Jankowski's comments.

A church committee for dialogue with Jews later issued a statement rejecting Rev. Jankowski's remarks and asking forgiveness from "those who feel offended." Some church officials and several journalists condemned the statements.

On Thursday, in a one-hour telephone conversation with Nobel Peace Prize winner and Holocaust survivor Elie Wiesel, Walesa said he did not condemn Rev. Jankowski because the church has done so and the church is the highest authority.

"He said that had he heard it [the remarks], he would have left the church in the middle of the sermon and that is a strong statement, especially in Catholic Poland," Wiesel told the Associated Press.

"I see it as a condemnation of the Rev. Jankowski's words," Wiesel said.

During the "very emotional conversation" with Wiesel, Walesa said he would tell Rev. Jankowski there is no place for anti-Semitism in his entourage and that an anti-Semite can never be his friend, according to Wiesel.

During commemorations in January of the 50th anniversary of the liberation of the Auschwitz death camp, Wiesel and Walesa finally made peace after weeks of controversy over the observances. Jewish groups had complained that the ceremonies, as planned, did not give enough weight to Jewish suffering at the hands of the Nazis.

Klezmer bands set to entertain at Ashkenaz fest

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Ashkenaz, a festival of New Yiddish Culture that unfolds at Toronto's Harbourfront July 4 to 9, features more than 100 performers and artists whose work explores the roots of Eastern European Jewish culture of centuries past.

Yet most bring a contemporary edge to their art that combines past, present and future.

"The essence of Klezmatics is this," explained Frank London, trumpeter in the six-piece klezmer band from New York's Lower East Side. "We're a tightly traditional klezmer group, and we've really studied the tradition and worked within it. But at the same time, we've also developed our own identity, which is really modern and cutting edge in the way we approach the music. We give people a very modern view of Jewish music from within the tradition."

Myron Schulz of the Winnipeg klezmer band Finjan offered a similar view of klezmer as a "traditional-nontraditional hybrid. We try to maintain elements of the traditional style such as energy, harmony, melody and, in some respects, arrangement. At the same time, we stretch out into other genres that are complementary to the style."

According to Schulz, klezmer helps listeners appreciate their ancestral heritage. "There's been an increasing awareness of roots and a desire for roots-type- music," he said. "With klezmer music — I'm getting a little mystical here — I think it really communicates with people on a subconscious level and draws them in."

The Klezmatics and Finjan are two of several well-known klezmer bands booked for the festival. Others include the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band from Canada, Muzsikas from Budapest, and the U.S.-based Brave Old World. As well, Klezmatic Frank London is appearing with Palestinian oud and violin virtuoso Simon Shaheen as part of what a festival publicity release describes as a "groove oriented Arab/Yiddish fusion quintet."

"The idea is to put both our musical experiences together and come together on two divurgent instruments, bringing together Arabic and Jewish traditions of music," he said.

For performance times and other information, please call Harbourfront Centre at 416-973-3000.

Eye on Arts

Fringe of Toronto Festival: This annual celebration of independent theatre, now in its seventh season, utilizes six theatres, each with 13 different productions, all within walking distance of each other in Toronto. For the standard ticket price of $7, you may attend such potentially interesting and unusual theatrical fare as:

- Crawling From the Wreckage, adapted from Charlotte Delbo by Alan Jones; staged by Gut Reaction. Written by a French resistance fighter and survivor of Auschwitz and Ravensbruck, the play juxtaposes two women's different responses to their torture under the Nazis. At The Glen Morris Studio.
- Hecatomb, a Chekhovian retelling of the Frankenstein myth, by the Mad Savages. Playwright and producer Naomi Savage is a student at the University of Toronto, and director Rebecca Brown is attending Playwright's Horizons in New York. At St. Vladimir Theatre.
- Voyeur, with actor/writer/director Evan Brooker, an exploration of fantasy and voyeurism versus reality. At the Annex Theatre.

The Fringe of Toronto Festival takes place June 30 to July 9. For further details, call 416-534-5919 or visit the box office, 293 Brunswick Ave., Toronto, open 12 to 8 p.m. daily during the festival.

Dracula in the Bales: Skylight Theatre and Arbour Festival Theatre present Dracula, Nightmare of the Dead at the Barry Zukerman Amphitheatre in Earl Bales Park, North York, from July 5 to August 6. Bram Stoker's literary creation is brought to life in this new adaptation by Canadian playwright Allan Stratton. With the eerie tree line of the park serving as an atmospheric backdrop, the play "will terrify and thrill audiences who dare to venture to the park at night," promises its promo. Admission by donation; all performances 8.30 p.m. 416-392-3846.

Canada Day & Klezmer: Prepare for lots of festivities, July 1 at Earl Bales Park, beginning at 4 p.m. with the Band of the Royal Regiment of Canada. At 8.30 p.m., hear the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band +4 followed at 10.30 p.m. by fireworks.

Upcoming Talent at Earl Bales: Performances include the National Ballet of Canada's Concert Group (August 9 & 10, 8 p.m.), Eva Fishman (August 13, 7.00 p.m.), children's magician Helena Fine and her Magical Basket (August 15, 6.30 p.m.), and classical pianist Yuval Fichman (August 16, 8 p.m.).

Student Video Wins Competition: Bagel Boulevard, a video produced by students of Beth Tikvah Congregation high school in Richmond, B.C., has won the second annual North American Jewish video competition.

Made in cooperation with Rogers Cable, the half-hour video tells the story of Chanukah, using a Sesame Street format but with live actors rather than puppets. It was directed by Joan Cohen, wife of the synagogue's rabbi.

Announcement of the award was made by the Judah L. Magnes Museum, the Jewish museum of the West, based in Berkeley. The video is among those to be shown at a Jewish film festival in Berkeley in July and August, and during a three-month exhibition of videos starting in November.

Rogers told Beth Tikvah it will distribute the film to all its outlets across Canada for showing at Chanukah.

Fiddler At O'Keefe: The original New York stage production of Fiddler On The Roof, directed and choreographed by Jerome Robbins, plays at the O'Keefe Centre for the Performing Arts, Toronto, Sept. 12 to 17.

A gala performance in support of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University is set for Sept. 13 at 8 p.m. Merle Goldman, 416-485-8000.

Better Late Than Never Department: Echoes of Angels, art by Rochelle Rubinstein Kaplan and Lanny Shereck, on display at York Quay Gallery, 235 Queen's Quay W., Toronto, until July 23. Gallery hours, 12 to 6 p.m., Tuesday to Sunday.

The work of prominent American artist Helen Frankenthaler, internationally recognized for her radiant colour and lyrical sense of abstraction, is on view at Gallery One, 121 Scollard St., Toronto to Sept. 1.

In Brief: Make A Wish, with Sharon, Lois & Bram, combines music and fantasy created through songs and special visual effects to introduce children to the Planetarium experience. Opens at The McLaughlin Planetarium, Bloor St. at Avenue Rd., Toronto, June 30, 1.30 p.m.

The Diary of Anne Frank is in performance July 12 to 30 at the Annex Theatre, 730 Bathurst St., Toronto, produced by Tribal Productions Inc. Reservations, 416-539-8755.

'Obscene' play presented

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Though it was shut down as "obscene" in New York in 1923, a play about a Jewish brothel owner and his wife who fail to protect the innocence of their 17-year-old daughter was presented without incident recently at Holy Blossom Temple.

A sold-out audience gave a standing ovation to God of Vengeance by Sholem Asch, presented by the new Temple Stagecraft Company.

Written in Yiddish in 1907, and taking place in a Polish provincial town, God of Vengeance was described as a "morality play" by Rabbi Dow Marmur who moderated the discussion following.

In the play, the brothel operator pays a large amount for a copy of a Torah scroll which he puts in his daughter's room to protect her virtue. When it turns out that Rivkele (the daughter) starts a lesbian relationship with one of the prostitutes, her angry father, Yankele, played by Joel Rose, calls off her marriage to a "respectable" Jew, and orders her to the brothel.

"I think the play is extremely relevant today," said director Joanne Rose. "Parents must live a good example if we are to have Jewish continuity."

"It shows the folly of pinning all your hopes on your children," said producer Roberta Presser.

Rose came across God of Vengeance in the Latner Jewish Public Library, and it falls neatly into the footsteps of the Temple Players of 20 year ago, who, under director Basya Hunter, staged many controversial plays.

The new company, which includes members of the temple's board and committees, hopes to stage the play again at the temple later this year.

The cast included Heather Finestone, Susanne Eiger, Alan Heavenrich, Judy Malkin, Jennifer Kepes, Catherine Bianco, Ellen Krabanow, Roberta Presser, Judy Kent, Gerry Babins, Roseanne Revzen and Christine File.

Book outlines ways to network

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Having to talk to strangers is a common social fear; so networking can be a scary prospect for many of us.

But if one can overcome this fear, there are substantial rewards to be reaped, said the author of a new book on networking.

If we are determined enough to expand our networks we can make contact with almost anyone, said Barry Siskind, and by using our networks we will eventually get the business lead or the job we want.

In Making Contact: Master the Art of Networking to Develop New Business Leads, Uncover Hidden Opportunities and Enhance Your Career (Macmillan Canada, $19.95), Siskind outlines several ways of controlling fears and anxieties and the self-defeating behavior that often arises from them. For example, he suggests analyzing negative thoughts such as "I'm always the only one at every one of these events who never knows anyone else."

He said the book prepares people psychologically for "the worst case" scenario — a roomful of strangers. It is also a guide to setting networking objectives, finding mentors, creating networking opportunities and understanding the process of networking.

Networking requires a lot of effort, Siskind stressed. At a networking event, he recommends working the room and meeting six people an hour. Anything less and you're taking it too easy.

If the room is full of strangers, he recommends finding someone who is alone "waiting to be approached," and starting a conversation.

Making Contact is full of tips for the inexperienced networker: take a deep breath and enter confidently, maintain eye contact during a conversation and listen to what the other person is saying.

"Listening is the act of making sure you really hear what the other person is saying," says Siskind. "And most of us are not as good at this as we think."

His list of the don'ts of networking include smoking, telling offensive jokes, drinking excessively, name dropping and complaining.

Siskind admitted he used to be "a pretty crummy networker" until he networked while researching his book. "I had to go out and do it and prove it worked," he said.

His inspiration for writing the book came from trade shows — "the granddaddy of networking," he said. A trade-and-consumer-show expert who helps exhibitors with their presentations, he realized that there are many other networking opportunities and thought the subject deserved a book.

Available across Canada, Making Contact has sold out in several bookstores. Siskind expects it will be a bestseller.

He called networking "the cheapest and fastest way of finding new business contacts or a new job" and attributed the current interest in networking to the economy. "So many people are opening up home-based businesses and the best way to do that is to establish a network," he said.

Chickens Get Reprieve

MONTREAL — An adequate supply of kosher chickens in Montreal has been assured for at least the next six months following the takeover of Marvid Poultry of Canada Inc. by a group of local Jewish businessmen.

According to Fred Pfeiffer, a member of the governing presidium of the Vaad Ha'ir, which oversees kashrut in Montreal, a last-minute reprieve was hammered out on June 19 between businessman Moishe Friedman, representing the Jewish group's interests, and Aliments Flamingo, which owned Marvid's, following a week of intensive negotiations.

Despite the fact that Marvid supplies well over 50 per cent of Montreal's kosher chickens, when Flamingo announced the planned closure of the Marvid plant in April, it blamed $3 million in losses dating back to 1988. Volaille Mascouche and Continental are the other kosher chickens suppliers in Montreal, the latter catering mostly to the ultra-Orthodox community.

$100 Million In Deals Expected

JERUSALEM — Business deals totaling some $100 million (US) were expected to be made at the fifth Business Forum and Conference, said forum chair Eitan Adres.

Almost 800 businesspeople from 25 countries attended the three-day event in Haifa last week. More than 180 Israeli business and industrial concerns presented their wares, seeking export markets or investment capital.

The United States and Canada lead in the number of overseas participants, who include Ralph Klein, premier of Alberta; Paul Bauman, deputy chair of Johnson and Johnson; Kewell president Jack Miller; and Tony Porter, vice-president of Hilton International.

May's CPI Rise Highest In '95

JERUSALEM — Israel's Consumer Price Index jumped one per cent in May, taking most economists by surprise, as moderating housing prices suddenly shot up in reaction to last month's devaluation of the shekel against the dollar.

258 HEALTH CARE

In the four years preceding my father's recent death he was cared for by a loving, compassionate and caring health care aid. She filled my father's last years with tenderness and this gave our family great peace of mind when we were not by his side. Her husband was certified as a health care aid earlier this year and also helped in my father's care in the last month of his life. If anyone is searching for speciili care for their loved ones on a live-out basis, look no further. Contact me at 905-886-1834 for a personal reference and contact number.

Auschwitz photos a mystery

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO —Who are the people in the photos and who were they sent to?

More than 2,400 photographs were found in a suitcase in Block 24 of the main camp of Auschwitz in January 1945. One package of 16 can be traced back to Ontario.

All the pictures found in the suitcase are personal photographs confiscated by the Germans when their owners arrived in Auschwitz – images of loved ones and special moments in the lives of the condemned.

"WHICH OF THE TWO IS PRETTIER?" This question is a translation of the Yiddish inscription which was written on the back of this photograph. The number on the 1936 Ontario license plate is CX-355. The photo was one of thousands found in the suitcase in Auschwitz.

Sharon Muller, a photo archivist at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., recently sent The CJN a letter, in which she enclosed seven of the 16 snapshots that had been sent to Poland from a family of Jewish immigrants to Canada in the late 1930s.

In one of the pictures, there is a car bearing a clearly visible 1936 Ontario licence plate, CX-355. In front of the car are a mother and daughter; the Yiddish caption reads, "Which of the two is prettier?"

One photo of two young children is marked, "Adam and Eve in the Garden of Eden." Another of a child at the beach is inscribed, "Here you have a 'natural' picture of your grandchild." Two young women at a summer resort are identified as "Two happy mothers." And one of a young child in a snowsuit is captioned, "Winter in Canada, but only for hearty little girls."

Muller hopes that, with the help of The CJN, she will be able to identify this family.

Until recently, she says, the photographs have been seen only by a handful of survivors and researchers, but the general public will soon be able to see them in the photo archives of the Holocaust Museum Research Institute in Washington.

Until last year the photographs were housed in the archives of the National Museum of Auschwitz-Birkenau. Then two staff members of the Washington museum archives went to Poland to view the collection.

After nine months of negotiations, the photographs were brought to Washington for duplication and archival cataloguing.

Some of the photos depict Jewish family and community life in Eastern Europe, mainly Poland. They portray courtships, marriages, births, family outings, vacations and youth group activities.

The collection also includes several dozen photographs of Jews wearing badges or armbands in the ghettos in the early 1940s.

Muller says one of the most touching images of the entire collection is a photograph of a father showing his two year old son a framed picture of his grandparents.

"It was the continuity between generations illustrated in this photograph that was forever lost as a result of the Holocaust," she says.

Storm over leaked document

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The top Israeli and Syrian military commanders wound up three days of talks in Washington last week. At the same time, the government and the opposition in Israel traded verbal blows over a leaked document connected with the talks.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin, who had earlier denied the existence of the document, which was disclosed by Likud opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu, later termed it "stolen."

A political firestorm erupted in the Knesset when Netanyahu said the document represented Rabin's instructions to Chief of Staff Lt.-Gen. Amnon Shahak for his talks with his Syrian counterpart in Washington.

Rabin called Netanyahu's claim a lie, insisting that he had never seen the document, which, he said, was an internal working paper of the Israel Defence Force.

Netanyahu hit back, calling Rabin and Foreign Minister Shimon Peres "liars" for trying to deny the validity of the document.

Media reports attributed the document to Brig.-Gen. Zvi Stauber, a member of Shahak's team in Washington.

Changes in The CJN

As part of The CJN's commitment to strive to extend the "reach" of the paper and to respond to the positive suggestions of our readers, we have introduced a number of changes in this issue.

1. The major stories from the Greater Toronto Area are now at the front of the paper before the stories from Coast to Coast. This has been done to improve the focus and the flow of the placement of news.

2. Rabbi Baskin's Book Reviews will now appear in the Jewish Life section.

3. Sheldon Kirshner's Mideast Analysis will appear in the Everywhere section.

4. We inaugurate two advice columns. Ask Ella appears in this issue and will alternate each week with Dear Jesse. Ella will deal with questions on a wide variety of subjects that touch the lives of CJN readers. Jesse will deal with questions of particular interest to senior citizens.

5. Travel, Arts, and Business are being rolled into one section called TAB news.

Over the course of the next few weeks CJN readers will notice a "refreshed" roster of columnists. We will be introducing Prof. Emil Fackenheim, Rabbi David Hartman, Prof. Morton Weinfeld and a group of young columnists who will write about college and campus life.

VACATION ... VACATION

During the upcoming Canada Day holiday, The CJN offices will be closed Monday, July 3. The offices will also remain closed that week to allow for vacation time.

There will be no issue of July 13.

CANADA

Witnesses Sought

OTTAWA — The Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) are looking for witnesses to Nazi atrocities committed in Ukraine, the former Soviet Union and Latvia.

The RCMP is searching for people who lived in or near the villages and towns of Kislovodsk, Galtchik, Mineraluye Vodi, Skalat and Ternopol in the former Soviet Union during World War II; those who lived in or near Vorms, Berezovka Rayon and Odessa Oblast in Ukraine from 1941 to 1944; and individuals who were in the Kaiserwald or Bikernieki Forest area of Latvia between July 1941 and December 1942.

Those with information are asked to call 613-990-8484.

Kudos for J'lem Pavilion

TORONTO — The Jerusalem pavilion won first runner-up as best overall pavilion in this year's Festival Caravan. The Zena Kossar Award for Best Pavilion went to Evora, a town in Portugal. Second runner-up was Tokyo.

The Jerusalem pavilion was the winner in the best Traditional Show category.

Pass Hate Bill: CJC

OTTAWA — Canadian Jewish Congress last week urged Canada's Senate to pass Bill C-41 as quickly as possible.

Appearing before the Senate committee on legal and constitutional affairs, Congress officials urged swift passage of the bill, which would allow for harsher punishments of hate crimes.

The House of Commons passed the bill earlier this month.

UBC Honorary Degrees

VICTORIA — Two Jewish showbiz notables recently received honorary doctorate degrees from the University of British Columbia.

Theatre impresario Garth Drabinsky and film director Arthur Hiller were honored.

Drabinsky is slated to open a theatre in Vancouver this fall. Hiller, a former resident of Edmonton and Toronto who now lives in Los Angeles, has directed a number of hit Hollywood movies.

New OJC Leaders

KELOWNA, B.C. — Larry Teal was elected president of the Okanagan Jewish Community (OJC) at the group's recent annual meeting. He succeeds Anita Nadler.

Other OJC officials include Evan Orloff, Susan Chernovsky, Susan Shawlee, Felicity Fuchs and Steven Fagen.

The group's annual picnic is scheduled for July 9.

Winnipeg Holds Line

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg Jewish Community Council (WJCC) is holding the line on expenditures, despite an additional $50,000 raised last year by the Combined Jewish Appeal drive.

The 1995-96 budget has been frozen at $392,132, said Jack Cipilinsky, the WJCC's director of finance. The only addition to funding has been $15,453 allocated to the March of the Living and to the Special Needs program.

The 1994-95 campaign raised nearly $900,000 for local needs.

Order of Canada

OTTAWA — Several prominent Jewish Canadians were named to the Order of Canada last week.

Among the 26 new Officers, the Order's second highest rank, are Winnipeg media mogul Israel Asper, theatre impresario Garth Drabinsky, philanthropist Murray Koffler (promoted from Member) and Montreal volunteer Sheila Kussner (promoted from Member).

Among the 50 new Members are cellist Ofra Harnoy, Edmonton scientist Cyril Kay and Toronto businessman David Mirvish.

ISRAEL

Bomb Wounds Soldier

JERUSALEM — An Israeli soldier was wounded in a Hezbollah roadside bomb attack in the Lebanese security zone last Tuesday.

An army spokesperson said troops were on patrol when an explosive device was detonated nearby.

Hezbollah said it had detonated two roadside bombs alongside an Israel Defence Force (IDF) infantry patrol.

'No Charity:' Rabin

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin last Wednesday called on Diaspora Jewry to be Israel's partner and not its benefactor.

Addressing Jewish Agency delegates at the Knesset, Rabin said: "We are not a poor country. If you want to be our partners, then be partners with us, but don't give to us as a charity."

Rabin also said he attributed the country's economic growth to the government's channeling of funds away from Jewish settlements.

Israelis Puff Away

JERUSALEM — Nearly one-third of Israelis smoke cigarettes daily, according to recent figures.

Of those Israelis who smoke, 30 per cent puff more than 20 cigarettes a day.

On a positive note, the health ministry noted a relative drop in smokers in the 18-24 age group.

WORLD

Vandal Sentenced...

AMSTERDAM — A man convicted of destroying a glass monument to the victims of Auschwitz here in January 1993 has been sentenced to 100 hours of public labor.

The judge said the man should complete the sentence in the field of art, a "positive" way to make up for the destruction of the monument.

...So is Chemist

STUTTGART — A German chemist was sentenced to 14 months in jail earlier this month for denying that Jews were gassed at Auschwitz.

A court here found Germar Scheerer, 30, guilty of inciting racial hatred by sending more than 1,000 politicians, scientists, journalists and business executives publications denying Jews were gassed to death at Auschwitz.

Otto Ernst Remer, 82, a former general and Hitler loyalist, paid Scheerer to test brick in the Auschwitz gas chambers for residues of zyklon-B gas.

Scheerer's 1991 report asserted that since he found none, gas could not have been used to kill Jews. Scheerer was fired from his job at the prestigious Max Planck Institute after publishing the report.

The Lowest Burial Cost Available from Any Jewish Establishment

When economy is a major consideration, you should know that Hebrew Basic Burial offers the lowest interment costs available from any Jewish establishment. Keeping burial costs low is in no way a negative reflection on either the family or the departed. Families who have used Hebrew Basic Burial's services have all found that dignity and observance of Jewish law were exactly as they should be – and far higher than they expected.

Low cost is just one of many factors which may be involved in arranging a burial that meets a family's emotional and spiritual needs. We welcome inquiries from people who would like to know more about the option of a basic Jewish graveside service and the savings that go with it.

Religious coalition comes to aid of refugees

Calls for more compassionate stand

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In a rare show of public unity, Jewish leaders joined a broad religious coalition last week to call on Ottawa and Canadians to adopt a more compassionate stand on refugees.

At Toronto's Church of the Holy Trinity, Jews joined Christians, Muslims, Sikhs, Buddhists and Hindus in signing A Call to Conscience, a statement rooted in large measure on None is Too Many, the historical account of Canada's dismal record of admitting Jewish refugees during World War II.

Canada's wartime policy was implemented "because politicians pandered to racist groups in the country, because the vast majority of the population did not ... seek to find out the truth of the refugee situation and because many church bodies did not make a vigorous effort to speak out," the statement says.

"We will not let this happen again. We believe it is now our moral duty to speak about the reality of Canada's treatment of refugees ... As people who have been shaped by the biblical tradition, we are called [on] to welcome the stranger as we would welcome God in our midst."

Signing the statement on behalf of the Jewish community, in the presence of Toronto Mayor Barbara Hall, were Canadian Jewish Congress past president Irving Abella and rabbis Gunther Plaut, Baruch Frydman-Kohl, Daniel Gotlieb and Mark Dratch.

Co-signatories were Jewish Immigrant Aid Services and B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights.

The statement charges that refugees are scapegoated for Canada's economic ills and often portrayed as welfare cheats, criminals and parasites.

It also slammed Canada's policy of charging a $975 "head tax" per refugee, saying refugees often spend all their savings just to get to Canada.

Rabbi Plaut and Bishop Nicola de Angelis of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops read A Litany of Concerns — a list of specific cases in which refugee claimants met a tragic end.

In his remarks, None is Too Many co-author Abella called Canadians "a nation of immigrants who hate immigration." He decried the "raw and blatant mean spiritedness" taking root here and abroad, and cited polls in this country showing that an increasing number of Canadians want fewer immigrants, especially visible minorities.

"Intolerance is the world's fastest growth industry. The doors are clanging shut all around the world to refugees and immigrants," he said.

Abella conceded that the refugee system has been abused. He called for its repair and for Canada "to return to its humanitarian ideal."

Catholic refugee activist Sister Mary Jo Leddy also reminded those present that Canada had the worst record of protecting Jewish refugees in the Western world.

"We must never let that happen again. We are not suggesting open borders, but we must not project our fears onto refugees. If we allow the suffering of refugees, we will lose sight of each other as fellow citizens."

Rabbi Gunther Plaut and Sister Mary Jo Leddy flank Prof. Irving Abella at last week's multi-faith call for more compassion for refugees. [Ron Csillag photo]

THE Baycrest Campaigner

What a way to start. What a way to go. The Baycrest Campaign is right on track toward its $60 million target, with a new Jewish Home for the Aged and its companion Centre for Cognitive Disorders as the goal. It's been a skyrocketing start, thanks to the generosity of so many including Barry and Honey Sherman, Wilfred Posluns and family, the Koschitzkys, the Goldstein family and the Mortons. But few know better than Allan Offman how much more challenging the next stage of our Campaign will be.

For the Offman family, fundraising is a rich tradition. Allan's late father Leon, founder of the Art Shoppe, still an Offman operation, was a canvasser for United Jewish Appeal in the 1940's. Allan has also been heavily involved with UJA, and has now turned his attention, as well, to Baycrest, as chairman of the nine person Campaign leadership team. "The Campaign is a singularly worthy cause, " he said. "Baycrest touches every family in one way or another."

The community, he pointed out, is more transient; less deeply rooted to Toronto, so the Baycrest message must be marketed aggressively. However, once that's done, Offman is confident the community will come through and the objective will be met.

Although Offman is gratified by the enthusiastic response so far, experience has taught him the toughest task lies ahead, as the Campaign concentrates on collecting the balance of its goal. "Some of my friends said this is going to be a 'slam dunk,'" he recalled. "I was careful to tell them it was going to be a challenge."

The Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care is a world leader in its field, internationally acclaimed for its innovative programs and ground breaking research. As the 21st century closes in, we're living longer than even science fiction writers would have dreamed about a century ago. That's the good news. The current Jewish Home for the Aged does not lend itself to the kind of care our elderly deserve.

This Campaign is about a new Jewish Home, Research, Rehabilitation, Community Outreach and Respite Care, and Education. All of which are required so that we can provide an environment to enhance the quality of life of our seniors.

"Science and technology have come so far in geriatric care in the last 25 years that we now realize what it will take to continue in our mission to enrich the lives of the elderly," said Offman.

Your gift to the Baycrest Campaign will help Baycrest build the future. Is there any more compelling reason to give?

Allan Offman

Wallenberg bust faces red tape

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The artist responsible for the towering, flame-topped Holocaust memorial in North York's Earl Bales Park is sharpening his chisels again.

But sculptor Ernie Raab must first chop through a mass of bureaucratic red tape before he realizes his dream of a public monument to World War II hero Raoul Wallenberg.

Raab, himself a Holocaust survivor, plans a bronze bust of Wallenberg, the Swedish diplomat credited with rescuing 100,000 Hungarian Jews from extermination at the hands of the Nazis.

Plans call for the memorial to be located about 100 metres from the Holocaust monument, on Raoul Wallenberg Boulevard inside Earl Bales Park.

Raab envisions a 50cm-by-50cm bronze bust atop a granite or concrete pedestal, with a plaque detailing Wallenberg's heroic exploits in Budapest in 1944-45.

A non-Jewish scion of a wealthy Swedish family, Wallenberg was dispatched to Budapest in 1944 to save as many Jews as possible from the Nazis and pro-Nazi Hungarian Arrow Cross. He issued thousands of false Swedish passports and took Jews to safe houses that flew the neutral Swedish flag.

He also persuaded the Nazis to call off the destruction of Budapest's Jewish ghetto. In all, Wallenberg rescued more Jews from the Holocaust than any one government.

But in 1945, he was arrested by invading Soviet troops as an American spy and taken to Moscow. It was then the mystery of Raoul Wallenberg began.

In 1947, the Soviets issued a statement that Wallenberg had died of a heart attack while in prison — a position they hold to this day. But for years after that, there were numerous reported sightings of the Swedish hero by former prisoners of the massive Soviet gulag.

A few years ago, the Soviets released some of Wallenberg's personal effects, following an international commission of inquiry. Theories have abounded that Wallenberg lived well beyond 1947 and may even be alive today, unrecognized and unheralded.

For Raab, Wallenberg holds special significance. After a series of escapes from both German and Russian labor camps, Raab lived as a gentile in Budapest in late 1944. He worked as a delivery boy for a bread factory, and saw Wallenberg one day while delivering bread to a Swedish safe house.

"There were about 16 or 18 people in one small room. Somebody said, 'That's Wallenberg.' I couldn't believe it. Even then, he was a hero," Raab told The CJN.

The bust will sum up the sculptor's lifelong desire to pay tribute to Wallenberg. Raab says the memorial will convey the Swede's "heroism, his humanity and his martyrdom."

Dan is honorary chair

The project's honorary chair is Toronto philanthropist Leslie Dan. Raab has the support of leading Jewish organizations and the Swedish government, and says most of the project's $25,000 to $30,000 cost is in place. The artist would like the bust unveiled this fall, but several bureaucratic hurdles must be cleared first.

According to Terry Nicholson, a cultural affairs officer with Metro Toronto's Parks and Culture Department, Raab's proposal was "not the way we prefer it."

Normally, he said, public arts proposals are tendered to artists.

If the project is approved, there will be a perception in the arts community that Raab "knows somebody" important and "that other artists did not get a chance."

Nicholson conceded there's "a certain logic" to Raab being the artist because of the proximity of the Holocaust monument.

But first, Metro's Public Art Policy Advisory Committee, composed of four Metro councillors and seven citizens, will convene a special meeting at the site to see the area firsthand, Nicholson said.

If the committee approves, the project then goes to the Environment and Public Space committee and if it approves, for a vote at Metro Council.

In the meantime, several long-term issues remain outstanding, Nicholson said, including ownership and maintenance of the bust.

It all adds up, he said, to a "deliberate and time-consuming process. Our objective is to do good art projects that will please the target audience and will be accepted by all."

He noted that a World War II memorial to be unveiled soon in Coronation Park took a year from initial proposal to completion.

Charles Harnick was sworn in last week as Ontario's attorney general. Harnick is the only Jewish MPP in the new Conservative government of Premier Mike Harris. Looking on is Ontario's new secretary of the cabinet, Sylvia Burak.

Federation get bylaw puts onus on husbands

TORONTO — The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto has become the first in North America to pass a precedent setting amendment on the get.

The pioneering bylaw change prevents an individual from holding an elected Federation position for refusing to "remove all barriers that are within his or her control and that would prevent the other spouse's religious remarriage."

If a husband denies his wife a get, she is known as an agunah and cannot remarry under Jewish religious law.

Federation president Sandra Brown said the amendment was reviewed by the city's rabbinical organizations before being submitted for Federation approval.

"That gives it a lot of weight," she said. "We have brought some Jewish public awareness to the issue that I think it deserves."

Joyce Eklove, the agunah rights chair for Jewish Women's Federation, said the new regulation gives the message: "If you want to behave in a way that is despicable to the Jewish community, you cannot serve." She added, "We want other organizations to follow the Jewish Federation's lead."

Eklove would also like to see synagogues introduce their own get policies. Machzikei Hadas, an Orthodox Ottawa congregation will not permit people who refuse their spouse a get to become members. According to Rabbi Reuven Bulka, the policy was approved five years ago without opposition and the synagogue has never been forced to implement it.

Under federal legislation, judges can withhold a civil divorce until religious obstacles are removed. However, Jewish Women's Federation president Glennie Lindenberg says family law practitioners are often not aware of the legislation.

There is also an Ontario law which denies a person relief in areas such as support payments and property rights, if he or she is an impediment to a spouse's remarriage.

UJA pledges set record

TORONTO — It took just 90 minutes, and the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) was $21 million ahead.

That amount was pledged over three years by 15 of Toronto's leading donors recently at the home of Barry and Honey Sherman.

"It was the most money ever raised by UJA through one meeting," reported Carol Kassel, co-chair of the 1996 UJA campaign.

The session was a test of UJA's new "three-year vision," in which contributors will be asked for a commitment covering that period. All of the participants, said Kassel, enthusiastically endorsed the plan.

Gerald Sheff, a former UJA campaign chair, said, "The time is now to be thinking long term for the community or we're going to be in trouble."

"The objective is to ensure funding stability," said Barry Sherman, who owns Apotex Inc., the Canadian pharmaceutical giant. He said contributors at the meeting, represented all ideological and religious viewpoints.

The upcoming campaign will be a significant departure from previous appeals, in which gifts were sought only for the year ahead.

Toronto goes 'Crazy for Jerusalem' at gala

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Jerusalem's 3000th birthday was celebrated at the Royal Alexandra Theatre recently.

More than 1,200 people attended the spirited gathering sponsored by Aish HaTorah Toronto — an educational outreach organization.

Music by the Zemer Orchestra and songs by Israeli Yoel Sharabi and other entertainers set the mood, as those present clapped and sang about Jerusalem and the joys of Israel's independence.

Throughout the evening, Israeli scenes and people were projected onto a large screen.

"I believe tonight's multi-media tribute to Jerusalem will touch your hearts and stimulate your minds," said entrepreneur Ed Mirvish, the honorary co-chair of the event with Leslie Dan.

Mirvish jested that thanks to Aish HaTorah, "I finally got to the stage of the Royal Alexandra." He said he had cancelled a performance of Crazy for You to present the 3000 anniversary celebration because "we are crazy for you, Jerusalem."

"For 3000 years, the Jewish people, even before we became a nation, have had a love affair, perhaps an obsession with Jerusalem," said master of ceremonies Malcolm Hoenlein, vice-president of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Organizations.

"When others who proclaimed an attachment to Jerusalem turned away — even destroyed it — we remained unyieldingly loyal. The Jews alone were the only ones faithful to Jerusalem," he said.

Citing a number of examples of Jewish commitment, he noted that when Jews pray they face Jerusalem and three times a day they pray for the restoration and rebuilding of Jerusalem and recite the prayer, "Next year in Jerusalem."

Community activist and Holocaust survivor Gerda Frieberg spoke of the 3000 years of "memories" that have kept our people together. She shared painful memories of Passover 1940, when her family was deported to a ghetto in Poland and her father was no longer with them. Her mother, she said, recited "Next year in Jerusalem" every year, even in the concentration camp, "in a time when we never planned for tomorrow."

Keynote speaker, Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert, presented an historical overview of the city up to the present.

"We came back to the most sacred places in Jewish life, never to leave them again," he said. The two elements that characterize the Jewish people, "which are unique to us, are memories — of pain and tears and longings — dreams, aspirations and prayers of coming back to where we belong. It takes courage and determination in order to protect the most precious things in Jewish history."

Others participating in the fund-raising celebration included Cantor Noam Goodman, Cayle Chernin, Zale Magder, Israel Consul General Dror Zeigerman and the Moses Brothers.

Baycrest, Senior Care merger applauded

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Formal approval of the merging of Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and Senior Care was the highlight of Baycrest's annual meeting last week at the Wagman Centre.

There was almost unanimous approval of the proposal presented by outgoing chairman of the board Stephen Cole and president and CEO Stephen Herbert, who jointly chaired the meeting.

In a departure from the usual annual meeting format, the speeches and reports were presented on videotape, interspersed with music and vignettes of residents and their families.

Reports were given on Baycrest's relations with other institutions such as the University of Toronto and the Central North York Multi-Service Agency; on the plans for the 80-unit assisted housing project at Neptune and Bathurst, the Apotex Jewish Home for the Aged and the 100-bed Centre for Cognitive Disorder; and on the centre's rehabilitation and outreach services.

Treasurer Martin Storm reported that Baycrest had "maintained programs and services, even increasing them when possible," despite a decrease in government funding.

He warned that there is an increase in the cash flow and operating deficits, and future government funding, the main source of financial support, is uncertain.

"Community support is vital," he said, adding he is confident that "Baycrest is always able to depend on community assistance."

Cole and Herbert said it is hoped the $60-million campaign currently underway "will lead Baycrest to the 21st century, [when] care of the aged will be the most dominant social issue."

The slates for board of directors and board of governors was elected.

Norman Schipper, past chair of the Baycrest Foundation, paid tribute to outgoing board members Helen Marr, Stephen Gottesman and Robert Rubinoff, and welcomed incoming members Tobie Bekhor and Shira Herzog.

During the luncheon attended by more than 250, slides thrown onto a large screen showed some of the centre's programs, activities and services. Smiling residents proudly wearing Baycrest walkathon T-shirts were especially appealing.

Day care program marks its 36th year

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — There was food, folks and freilichkeit in Baycrest Hospital's garden court when well-wishers gathered to celebrate the 36th anniversary of Baycrest Day Care services for Seniors.

Stephen Herbert, president and CEO of Baycrest Centre, announced that North York Mayor Mel Lastman had declared the day "Baycrest Day Care Services for Seniors Day" in honor of the anniversary.

Close to 180 seniors use the services, which include arts and crafts, discussion groups, exercise, hot meals and door-to-door transportation.

Esther Nixel joined the program in 1992. "I was shy and very much of a loner, but after the first few months I began speaking in public," she said. "Day care helped me out in my loneliness. I look at day care as my home away from home."

Volunteer Felicie Blatt told The CJN that program participants like Nixel like reminiscing about the past in her current events group. "In Yiddish they really come alive. They love the old expressions and they love to laugh."

In response Nixel quipped, "As I always say, 'A laugh a day keeps the doctor away.' "

Baycrest Day Care Centre for Seniors, Canada's first day care program for adults, was the brainchild of the late Walter Lyons, the director of social services, and Sam Ruth, president emeritus of the Baycrest Centre Foundation. They realized they could defer admission to the Jewish Home for the Aged with a day program that offered hot meals and companionship, Ruth said.

The program, initially funded by Baycrest's Women's Auxiliary, started with five members and a borrowed station wagon.

Day care director Joyce Lagunoff said that in the last 10 years the average age of members rose to 85 from 77. The oldest day care member is 102.

Services are provided for 68 cognitively impaired seniors through the Samuel Lunenfeld Special Day Care Centre, which opened in 1987.

A plea and a warning

Last week at the Church of the Holy Trinity in Toronto, there was a rare ecumenical gathering of representatives of many of the faiths practised by Canadians. The leaders assembled in the downtown Toronto church to warn the government and the general public against the feelings of intolerance and narrow-mindedness that they sense is encroaching into and taking hold of the Canadian mood. The gathering was as much a plea for generosity as it was a warning against xenophobia.

We support the efforts and the cause of that inter-faith gathering.

Last year The CJN offered a qualified, cautious approval of the new immigration policies unveiled by the government. At that time we wrote: "To be sure, the proposals contain some aspects which are reasonable and praiseworthy, such as the intention to root out the malign and criminal element within the system, or the decision to allow more true refugees into the country ... But they also contain aspects which raise concerns ... If the government's proposals are the beginning of a mean-spirited, less humanitarian immigration program, the country will ultimately be poorer ... The implementation of the new policies will warrant close watching."

Under close watching, the policies have been found to be lacking, thus calling into question the bona fides of the government's stated intention to facilitate the arrival of more true refugees. In particular, as the inter-faith group pointed out, the government deserves to be censured for having imposed a landing fee of $975 upon all immigrants, even upon refugees. A number of people, including the respected activist and advocate, Sister Mary Jo Leddy, have attested to the fact that some refugees are now going without food in an effort to save the money to hand over to the federal government.

Irving Abella, past president of Canadian Jewish Congress, spoke at the rally. He touched the heart of the issue. "There are people who still need our help, and we still can provide it." Despite the recession and need for governments to reduce their respective deficits, we can still provide help to the truly needy. Canadians must not be swept up in the intemperate, anti-immigrant winds blowing from other parts of the world. For in their wake they generally leave an unkind, pitiless public policy that diminishes the host landscape as well as the individuals they scapegoat.

The term "refuge" means a place that provides shelter from danger or distress. No country can be called great that demands an entrance fee from people who are — in the words of Emma Lazarus — often "hungry, tired, poor, a wretched refuse" seeking shelter from the storm of persecution.

Two tracks, two trains

Israel is negotiating on two tracks. And the trains appear to be moving. The chiefs of staff of Israel and Syria, Amnon Shahak and Hikmat Shehabi respectively, met in Washington last week to discuss security arrangements between the two countries. Israel and the Palestinians have been meeting on an ongoing basis to work out details of Israel Defence Forces redeployment and Palestinian elections in the West Bank.

As of this writing, the Israeli media is awash with tentative, cautious stories that there has been a measure of agreement between the negotiating parties on both tracks. But whenever — if ever — the parties reach full agreement between themselves, the trains will not yet have arrived at the peace stations. For the government of Israel, and indeed the Palestinian Authority, will have to "reach agreement" with the majority of their own people as well on any accords signed.

There may indeed be a light flickering in the distance. But the tunnel is very long.

We owe a debt to Herb Gray

In The Scene from Ottawa (June 15), Richard Cleroux wrote of Herb Gray and his many fine qualities as a parliamentarian and a Jew.

While note was made of his observance, I believe that Herb Gray's special quality which best expresses his Judaism is his absolute integrity. Maclean's magazine had an article on Herb Gray. It was entitled Mister Integrity.

As a former colleague in parliament, I cannot think of another MP more highly respected than Herb Gray. He is a credit to the political process, to his country, to his family and very much to the Jewish community and the Judaism which nurtured his values.

As Mr. Cleroux said, he doesn't make a big thing about being a Jew, but he does manifest it quietly and admirably. We as a community owe him much. As a Jew and a colleague, I am proud.

Rejects Laborite view of Altalena incident

Sheldon Kirshner (in "The Altalena incident" June 25) perpetuates the Labor Zionist myth that were it not for Socialist Zionists, Israel would never have been created. The truth of the matter is that, then and now, the Laborites were more interested in socialism and universalism than Zionism and Judaism. In addition, regardless of the coalition in power, it is the Labor Zionist institutional control of everything from unions to sports teams that makes Israel a one-party bureaucratic state.

The destruction and murder aboard the Altalena were Ben-Gurion's and Rabin's way of insuring socialist hegemony via the vilification of the Irgun, which in turn facilitated Begin's imprisonment. Begin and the Irgun's crime was to reject Ben-Gurion's passivity regarding the Hagana's refusal to fight to ensure Jerusalem's inclusion in the nascent state. Thus, the Altalena's arms were necessary to recapture Jerusalem.

According to Moshe Arens (Broken Covenant, p.122) Rabin sees the world in terms of which side of the Altalena one was on. As a result, the Laborites raison d'etre is fighting internal 75-year-old grudges; thus they would rather collaborate with Communist and pro-PLO political parties in the Knesset than hold referendums, lest the State is weakened beyond repair. Sheldon Kirshner would better serve the powerless majority in Israel and help ensure Jewish and Israeli survival by not accepting at face value the revisionism of the Laborite elite.

Marc Baker
Windsor

Sheldon Kirshner replies: Reputable historians concur that the Labor Zionist movement played an inimitable role in the establishment of Israel.

Why a cross at this grave?

I visited three military cemeteries in Holland recently, with a listing of Jewish boys buried there.

At the cemetery Berge-Op-Zoom, I discovered a grave of Sapper F. S. Weller, Royal Canadian Engineers. Reg #D-130015. The regiment and number correspond with the Canadian Jewish Congress Book. I photographed the head stone (Killed Dec. 27, 1944).

There is one problem and that is he is buried under a cross. The others were buried under a Jewish star. The Congress book lists his mother as Mrs. M. Weller.

My interest in this matter (being a member of Gen. Wingate Branch of The Royal Canadian Legion) is to see that this is corrected.

Finding fault with Rabin government

Precisely what is going on in the Jewish world today? We have in Israel a non-Judaic, non-Zionistic, government virtually begging the Arabs to take what they couldn't conquer in five wars and more than 50 years of terrorism, namely all of the land of Israel. By all of the land of Israel, they mean not just Judea and Samaria, but also Jaffa, Tel Aviv, Haifa and Acre etc. — in short, everything. Arafat and his people make no bones about it. They say it will be called the state of Palestine with Jerusalem as its capital. Do we hear any cries of outrage from many of our Jewish leaders and rabbis? Quite the contrary, the silence is deafening.

The Arab terror organization headed by Yasser Arafat rests on two pillars, the national covenant formulated in Cairo in 1964 and the phased plan for the destruction of Israel, formulated in Cairo in 1974. The national covenant unequivocally calls for the destruction of the Jewish state. Article 2 of the phased plan says an Arab state will be established in any part of the territory the enemy relinquishes. Article 8 of the phased plan says that from that state, a general Arab military assault on a shrunken and indefensible Israel will be launched. Yet the Rabin government continues with great haste to finalize the piece-by-piece process, because that is precisely what it is — not a peace process, but rather the piece-by-piece dismemberment of the state of Israel. It is a terrible situation. The government, in order to stay in power, allows itself to be dictated to by the extreme left wing of the Israeli Labor Party.

Correction

In the letter from Rabbi Silberstein which appeared in last week's issue, we inadvertently changed the text of the prophet Malachi regarding the immutability of G-d. The text should have read: "I G-d have NOT changed . . ." No offence was intended to Malachi or to G-d.

PART II

By STEVEN EMERSON

Of all the Islamist militant groups active in America, Hamas has developed the most sophisticated infrastructure, complete with charitable, political, social and even military wings. The story of how a young man named Nasser Issa Jalal Hidmi was recruited and trained by Hamas shows how elaborate and sophisticated the Hamas military network in the United States has become. Hidmi's story was reconstructed by studying documents retrieved by Israeli investigators and confessions to Israeli courts by various Hamas operatives.

As a student in a Jerusalem preparatory college, Hidmi joined an Islamic religious group that served as a greenhouse for future military operatives. Motivated by a strong antipathy to Israeli occupation, Hidmi soon found his way to a cleric who went by the nom de guerre of Abu 'Ubada and supervised a unit of Hamas terror squads. In a short time, Hidmi showed promise and was selected to participate in armed training in the United States, a place he had always wanted, but could never afford, to visit.

In June 1990, a few months after arriving in the U.S. and settling in Manhattan, Kansas, Hidmi received a phone call from Mohammed Salah, a Chicago-based used-car salesman who served as commander of the military wing of Hamas in the United States. (Salah has since confessed to abetting terrorist acts and is serving a five-year sentence in an Israeli prison.)

Following Salah's instructions, Hidmi flew to Chicago for a weekend of military-style training at a campground on the outskirts of the city. In this "basic training" course, Hidmi and 25 other young Palestinians received religious instruction. According to Hidmi's later confession, they also were taught how to plant car bombs. A Libyan-American identifying himself as a former marine explained to the group, using charts and diagrams, where to place a bomb in a car's engine and how to ensure its detonation at the point of ignition. Following this instruction, the recruits returned home.

Later that year, Hidmi and the other Hamas inductees were told to attend an Islamist convention in Kansas City. Over the next three days, they listened as top Hamas officials spoke of their pride in the organization and in the international Islamist movement, and railed against the Zionist conspiracy. Musa Abu Marzuk, the international political chief of Hamas, who was then living in Louisiana, called upon all Muslims to destroy the "outpost of Western influence" that was created with the "purpose of being a spearhead in the heart of the Muslim world."

During the conference, Mohammed Salah — the Chicago-based Hamas commander — organized a series of smaller workshops for Hidmi and other recruits at a nearby Ramada Inn. At the front of the room, a burly man introduced himself as Ibrahim Mahmoud Muzayyin, director of an organization now called the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development (at the time called the Occupied Land Fund), which officially raises money for charity in the West Bank and Gaza.

According to the information retrieved by Israeli investigators, Muzayyin told the group: "You have been assembled here because you are all residents of the occupied territories. And you have been chosen to carry out operations to escalate the intifadah on behalf of the Hamas movement."

After a series of pep talks, the group broke into smaller clusters. The instructor explained that everyone would undergo instruction in handling improvised explosives and hand grenades and in building car bombs. They would also receive training in interrogation and execution of collaboration, surveillance and political organizing.

Six months later, the group met again in Kansas City. This time, Mohammed Salah introduced Najib al-Gosh, now the editor of Muslim Arab Youth Association's flagship magazine. Al-Gosh lectured on the interrogation methods used by Israeli intelligence, as well as on different kinds of hand grenades and bombs. According to Israeli information, Salah interjected, "The purpose of all this is so that everyone will go home and plant explosives in the area where he lives."

Upon his return to Israel, Hidmi was arrested. In early 1993, Salah, too, was arrested by Israeli authorities and indicted in the Ramallah Military Court. When news of his detainment was first reported in the U.S., along with Israeli complaints that Hamas had established a terror network here, the FBI initially dismissed the allegations.

"We were wrong," says former FBI official Revell. "We didn't know what was going on in our own backyard."

During Salah's interrogation, conducted in Arabic, he confessed — albeit by signing a Hebrew document — to making several surreptitious trips to Israel, where he directed Hamas operations and transferred $230,000 for the purchase of weapons out of a total of $790,000 he intended to bring later. He revealed that in Chicago he kept a map of where two kidnapped executed Israeli soldiers were buried by Hamas death squads. And he told of how, following the deportation of the Hamas leadership to Lebanon, he helped rebuild the group's command structure.

Other information obtained by Israeli authorities confirmed that, since 1987, Salah had recruited hundreds of Hamas operatives, arranged for their training in car bombs and other explosive devices (including chemical weapons) and even built 14 timers for explosives himself.

Hamas has been the most successful of the militant Islamic organizations both in sending its officials to work in U.S.-based organizations and in raising funds here. Today, law enforcement and intelligence officials say, the most senior-ranking Hamas official living in the U.S. is Sheik Jamal Said of the Bridgeview Mosque in Chicago. Although Said has denied any links to Hamas, Salah and other Hamas operatives have told Israeli intelligence they received instructions from him. U.S. officials also maintain that Said has worked closely with and on behalf of two other groups with ties to Hamas: the Islamic Association for Palestine (IAP) and the Holy Land Foundation for Relief and Development. Both groups are headquartered in Richardson, Tex., less than a mile apart, in nondescript strip shopping malls. "There's no doubt," says Revell, "that these two groups are Hamas fronts."

What are these organizations? The Holy Land Foundation is Hamas' overt fund-raising arm in the United States. According to its English brochures, it openly solicits tax-deductible donations for such charitable causes as "needy Palestinian children, health clinics and schools." While some of its money is spent accordingly, most of its funds are routed though local Zakat (or mandatory Islamic charity tax) organizations run by Hamas in the West Bank and Gaza. These organizations not only serve to indoctrinate Muslim youths into radical Islamist ideology, but also provide covert cash conduits to Hamas military squads.

The IAP, while claiming that it conducts no fundraising for activities outside the United States, does operate an extensive propaganda network, according to a review of internal materials, videos and documents. Indeed, with offices and affiliates in more than a dozen cities, IAP is a veritable public relations machine. It publishes newspapers, produces terrorist training and recruitment videos (some showing terrorists who boast of their "kills" and interrogations of "collaborators" just before their executions), disseminates videos, organizes conferences and even sponsors a travelling Hamas musical troupe. (One of the troupe's songs includes the refrain: "We buy Paradise with the blood of the Jews.")

The IAP also publishes the largest Arabic-language newspaper in the United States, al-Zaitonah, as well as the English-language Muslim World Monitor. Both papers frequently celebrate successful Hamas terrorist attacks. An October 1994 headline in al-Zaitonah, for example, proclaimed, "In its greatest operation, Hamas takes credit for the bombing of an Israeli bus in the centre of Tel Aviv." Other articles warn of anti-Muslim conspiracies, such as an alleged joint plot by the Mossad and the FBI to bomb the World Trade Centre and throw the blame on Muslims. Despite such incendiary content, however, AT&T, MCI and other companies, as well as the U.S. Bureau of Prisons (which is in search of Muslim chaplains) have advertised in IAP publications.

On a narrow dead-end street in Tampa, Fla., a sign is affixed to the last house on the block. "Izz al-Din al-Qassam ... declared Jihad against the British and Zionist invasion of Palestine," it reads. "He was martyred on Nov. 19, 1935, in Ya'bad, Palestine. Al-Qassam has become a symbol of heroism, resistance, occupation and invasion of steadfast Palestine." Indeed, for militant Palestinians, al-Qassam may be the most exalted figure in recent history.

One of the more unusual visitors to Tampa over the past several years has been Sheik Abdul Aziz Odeh, the spiritual leader of the Palestine Islamic Jihad. Following his deportation from Gaza in 1988, Odeh quickly set up office and branches in Beirut, Amman and Damascus. Odeh later entered the U.S., slipping past INS officials unaware of his political identity. He later gravitated to two cities in particular: Brooklyn, where he had become a hero to El-Sayyid Nosair and other militants; and Tampa. In Brooklyn, Odeh became so actively involved with the World Trade Centre conspiracy defendants that he was named as the only unindicted co-conspirator in the Trade Centre bombing.

Within the American Muslim population of 5 to 6 million, radical groups and their adherents represent only an extremist fringe. Their militant interpretation of Islam does not reflect mainstream Islam, which eschews violence and thoroughly repudiates terrorism. But Muslim organizations are increasingly succumbing to the influence of militant Islam.

"Islamic fundamentalists now control many of the Muslim organizations in the United States," says journalist Ahmed Said Nasr. As a result, Nasr says, "there is more genuine intellectual freedom of expression for Muslims living in Cairo than in the United States."

The cruel irony for the vast majority of Muslim immigrants who came to the U.S. to escape Islamist turmoil in their homelands is that the proliferation of radical Islamist groups on American soil throws them back into the old vortex of polarized politics many had sought to escape. The danger is another matter. Militant Islam remains a fringe element in Western Muslim communities. But, as the World Trade Centre bombing shows, it does not take a big group to make a big catastrophe.

A controversial minority vote

By Shira Herzog

The recent non-confidence motion by Arab Knesset members over the Israeli government's decision to expropriate lands in the Jerusalem area drew attention to the curious situation of the Arab parliamentarians. For the current government, dependent on a slim parliamentary majority, the Arab members are part of the blocking vote that prevents the opposition from defeating it in Knesset votes. However, Arab Knesset members are not viewed as full-fledged, legitimate participants in political decision-making. Israeli prime ministers have not been prepared to rely on the Arab caucus for their majority, and they have never included an Arab party in the coalition.

The vote against the government in concert with right-wing Jewish parties was an unusual exercise of political clout by a minority that has historically been unwilling — and unable — to effectively exercise the power inherent in a group representing 16 per cent of the population in a democracy. Especially in Israel's electoral system of proportional representation, strategic use of this electoral power could yield significant gains.

Israel's Arab citizens today number close to 800,000 out of a total population of approximately 5.4 million. This group comprises those Arabs who remained within Israel's borders after the 1948 War of Independence and who were subsequently granted Israeli citizenship. The group's position in Israel has always been characterized by tension on several levels. First, there is the inherent tension in being a non-Jewish minority in a state that defines itself in ethnic-Jewish terms. Second, there is the pressure of being an Arab minority in a state that has been at war with its Arab neighbors. Finally, there are the socio-economic gaps that are typical of minority-majority relations in many multi-ethnic societies.

Although Israeli Arabs have always identified with the state in civic terms and have generally been loyal to its institutions, they have not enjoyed true equality in either principle or practice. In trying to illustrate what he has termed an "impossible situation," Israeli author David Grossman has described the country's Arab minority as "sleeping on a wire."

Over the last 30 years, approximately half of Israel's Arab voters have voted for Jewish political parties, and only half have voted for Arab lists. (For example, in the current Knesset, one Likud seat and one National Religious Party seat are held by those parties thanks to Arab voters, while the Labor party appointed its Arab MK Nawif Masalha as deputy-minister of health.) The surprising number of votes for Jewish parties stemmed from an expedient analysis of municipal benefits; a system of patronage within the parties; and a sense of the futility of voting for marginal Arab parties as a means of furthering the Arab community's interests.

Many years ago, the late Arab MK Aziz al-Zouabi used to say, "I am not accepted in Jewish society because I am an Arab, and I am not accepted in Arab society because I am Israeli." In the reality of 1995, things are more complex. A new, educated generation of leadership in the Arab community, that was born into the state and shares cultural characteristics — including language — with its Jewish co-citizens, is arguing, not for cultural assimilation, but for equality of opportunity. In areas such as education and municipal services, the government has acknowleged the gap in services to Arab communities and has moved — albeit slowly — to redress it. Israeli Arab leaders acted as intermediaries between Israeli authorities and Hamas while Nachshon Wachsman was held hostage and later as go-betweens between Hamas and the PLO.

In a shifting regional reality, Israeli Arab politicians may use their political power more effectively. In the past, the large parties could relegate the marginal number of Arab MKs to a position of irrelevance in important votes on security issues. In the 1996 election, a more disciplined Arab turnout in favor of Arab parties could result in more than the traditional five seats to Arab MKs. If this happens, it may be difficult to ignore these seats during coalition negotiations and Knesset votes.

More political clout for Arab parliamentarians is likely to generate controversy within Israel. A 1994 survey of mutual perceptions of Israeli Arabs and Jews, conducted by the Jerusalem-based Guttman Institute, found significant gaps between the Arabs' interest in furthering their civic status and Jewish support for such integration. For example, while over 90 per cent of Arabs surveyed said they would like to see an Arab mayor in a mixed municipality and an Arab holding a cabinet post in the national government, a majority of Jews surveyed disagreed with both statements. At the same time, Jewish citizens surveyed ranked Arab-Jewish relations as the most problematic of the country's inter-group relations.

There are no easy answers to these fundamental questions that hit at the core of Israel's definition of itself as a Jewish state and a democracy. As stereotypes are being questioned and new patterns of behavior are emerging, Israeli attitudes and norms are being challenged.

For Jews living in democracies outside of Israel, this issue resonates somewhat differently. Historically, Jewish communities have sought security through the equality and protection offered by democracy, and through effective use of their political clout in multicultural societies. Accepting these principles on behalf of Israel's Arab minority poses a host of difficult questions that we would do well to ponder.

Who is this mystery guest?

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

If you have a habit of going to theatres to see a film you will know this man. Even I, who rarely visit the cinema, have known the name and the face for quite some time. I will reveal his identity a little later on, but if you want to exercise your ingenuity or your ability to unravel this mini-mystery, don't cheat, and wait until you get to the finish line by yourself. (Before I go any further, let me say that the vital information I am about to impart to you comes from the National Post and Opinion, published by my old friend Gabriel Cohen in Indianapolis.)

When he was a child, he was known as Isser Danielovitch. He came from a traditional family, was sent to cheder and was informed by his parents that his next step would be to go to a yeshivah. But Isser balked, and apparently his parents decided not to force him to enter more intensive religious studies against his will.

However, the result was that the boy wanted to make sure to separate himself from any possibility of yeshivah-like learning and from his parents' lifestyle and roots. Judaism became something that belonged to his past, but neither to his present nor his future.

He was able to follow his major dream: to become an actor, and in time he succeeded beyond his wildest dreams. With a changed name that hid his Jewish identity, he became one of Hollywood's great stars and a household word amongst film aficionados. He married and had children, and when they grew up, one of his sons, Michael, reversed the road his father had trodden and returned to a meaningful Jewish life. More than that, he persuaded his father, who was now in his 70s, to do the same.

The father began by reading the Bible and worked his way through Genesis. I presume he did it with a commentary, though I am only guessing. Now that he is nearing his 80th birthday and studying Exodus, he sees some parallels between Moses and himself. Moses too, for the first four score years of his life, had no part in his own people's strivings and hopes.

Furthermore, our film hero wants to imitate Moses by climbing Mount Sinai and feels that he is in good enough physical shape to make the attempt. (He did not say which of the reputed sites of the holy mountain he would choose.)

When interviewed recently, he said, "I drifted away from my Judaism. Lots of people seem to dismiss religion based on what they learn when they are 13. I was one of those stupid people." Then he went on to tell how his son Michael brought him face to face with his past: "He asked me one day about where my parents came from. Can a man know who he truly is if he doesn't know who his ancestors are? I began reading about Abraham and Moses, and the more I read, the happier I felt. The more I studied Judaism and Jewish history, the more it fascinated me. I began to learn Hebrew. I knew lots of prayers but not what I was saying. I have come home now but still have a long way to go."

For a long time our "mystery guest" has been known as Kirk Douglas, who made these remarks at a dinner where money was raised for the Jewish National Fund in Britain. The newspaper's headline asks, "If Kirk Douglas can, what about you?"

Can you repeat the question?

By Julien Bauer

June 24, St. John the Baptist; July 1, Canada Day. This is the right season to wonder what Quebec actually wants and how Montreal Jews should react to the forthcoming referendum.

In the immortal words of humorist Yvon Deschamps, contrary to what you may read in your daily paper, the quasi-totality of Quebecers agree on a very simple and clear remedy: A free Quebec within a strong and united Canada! This ambivalence is what makes our country such an amazing place. You may be everything and the opposite and feel happy about it.

As the current Parti Québécois (PQ) government and the Bloc Québécois (BQ) state so logically, "Damn you, Anglos, and pass my Canadian passport. I want to spend my Canadian dollars abroad."

Debating our political structures has become a ritual. Every so often, it comes back. Referendum gives us the idea we have no right to live in Canada without asking ourselves the same question, again and again.

The first time an independentist government was elected in Quebec in November 1976, many Jews panicked. A quarter of the Jewish population left. We exported young professionals and kept most of the elderly who often live at or below the poverty line.

Will history repeat itself? Without being either Pollyannaish or paranoid, the answer is probably NO. Forbearing tremendous changes, the referendum will be lost by the PQ-BQ. The only way to win it is by asking a meaningless question.

In the upcoming referendum, what should be the role of the Jewish community? As part and parcel of Quebec and Canada, we have the right, even the duty, to ask for equal opportunity for our people. The fact is that in many jobs related to the public service, provincial Crown corporations and the like, the number of Jews is dismal. As part and parcel of Quebec and Canada, we have the right to vote the way we want.

The question should be: "What is the most effective way of preventing a YES victory, a frontal attack or a multi-faceted presentation of our view?" Three groups, Canadian Jewish Congress, Canadian Italian Congress and the Greek community have already taken a common stand totally opposed to separation.

By doing so, they are stating the obvious. They are also playing into their opponents' hands. Nearly all Greeks, Italians and Jews will vote NO. Any appeal by their leaders to do so is therefore useless. The marginal few voting NO won't be moved by any argument from the leaders. The vast majority of French-Canadians will vote without taking into consideration minority groups' declarations.

There is, nevertheless, a small group of undecided voters who could switch to the YES side if the PQ-BQ play their cards well: "Look at all those people [with an emphasis on their being non-French-Canadian] who are telling us what to do, what is good for us. Give them a lesson and vote YES." To help the PQ-BQ win more votes does not exactly seem a bright idea.

Does that mean we should stay on the sidelines? Certainly not. What we have to do is to monitor and, if need be, correct the situation by making sure every eligible voter is registered; to work on referendum day to have the vote get out; to participate in the campaign at the grassroots level; to make clear it is possible to love both Canada and Quebec. Such a policy is less glamorous but more effective. It is not by chance that our sages have stated: "What is important is not what you say but what you do."

Songs of a Yiddish bard sung by a German

By Sheldon Kirshner

Wearing black loafers, charcoal trousers, a purple jacket and an open-necked shirt of phantasmagoric colors, Manfred Lemm strummed a guitar as he belted out a medley of sonorous Yiddish songs in a strong Litvak accent.

The poignant melodies, suffused with the spirit of the shtetl, encompassed themes ranging from the plight of unemployed workers to the comic spat between a young bickering couple.

Beyond the bitter-sweet cadences of the music, the evening was steeped in historic irony. Fifty years after the end of World War II, Lemm — a German — was singing the beloved ballads of Mordechai Gebirtig, a Kracow carpenter-cum-composer who was murdered by the Germans during the Holocaust.

And the concert — co-sponsored by the Holocaust Remembrance Committee and the Committee for Yiddish of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto — took place in an unlikely locale, the Goethe Institute, which promotes German language and culture.

Lemm himself, an affable musician with a disarming manner, was acutely aware of the ironic overtones. After his official program, he began singing Jerusalem of Gold, an Israeli song-cum-anthem which surfaced in 1967, the year of the Six Day War. As he finished, Lemm paused: "Mr. Scheffler," he said mischieviously in somewhat fractured English, "doesn't believe that in a German institute we sing a Hebrew song."

Lemm's offhanded remark was directed at the Goethe Institute's director, Wilfried Scheffler, who sat in the back row. Scheffler, a smile wreathing his face, acknowledged Lemm with a thumbs-up sign.

The following morning, in an airy downtown restaurant where he partook of a light breakfast of coffee and orange juice, Lemm spoke about his passion for Gebirtig, whom he has tirelessly promoted in concerts and recordings and in a book.

He was asked the usual question. Why, as a Christian and especially as a German, does he devote his artistic career to Gebirtig?

After a conversation with him lasting almost two hours, a listener realizes there is no single compelling reason for his attachment to Gebirtig. Lemm appreciates the beauty, simplicity and raw truth of the lyrics. He identifies with Gebirtig's shtetl culture. And because he empathizes with the underdog, he uses the songs to build bridges, almost irreparably shattered by the Nazis, between Jews and Germans.

The son of a seventh-generation eastern German gardener of French Huguenot origin, Lemm was born in 1946 in Potsdam, into a musically-inclined family. His father, a Social Democrat, was an ambulance driver during World War II. His father's cousin was an ardent Nazi. In 1957, the Lemm family resettled in what was then West Berlin.

Lemm was drawn to Jewish folk music after his rock n'roll band was chosen to participate in a cultural exchange program between Berlin and Tel Aviv. Due to the Six Day War, the tour was cancelled. By then, Lemm had learned phonetic Hebrew and developed an interest in Jews and their fate during the Holocaust.

One thing led to another. He incorporated Hebrew songs into his band's repertoire. He studied voice and composition in Munich. He met Jews who introduced him to Yiddish — which is largely based on medieval German — and to Gebirtig.

A bard and a poet, Gebirtig (1877-1942) was unschooled in the academic formalities of music. In fact, he could not even read music. Transcribed by admirers, his songs — running the gamut from Kinder Yorn and Shlof Shoyn Mein Yankele to Undzer Shtetl Brent and Raizele — found an appreciative audience in Poland, North America, Argentina and elsewhere.

In June 1942, Gebirtig, his wife and two daughters were murdered by the Nazis. But Gebirtig's voice was not stilled. He left behind upwards of 90 lilting songs, a rich legacy which Lemm has mined indefatigably.

Shtetl culture conveyed

Lemm has been assisted by a Jewish executive from New York City, Manfred Lehmann. On a business trip to Kenya some years ago, Lehmann turned on his shortwave radio and caught a program of Yiddish songs. To his surprise, he learned that he was listening to Deutsche Welle — German national radio — and a German crooner named Manfred Lemm.

Lehmann wrote a letter to Lemm, and an invaluable friendship took root. As Lehmann put it in a recent essay in the Algemeiner Journal: "We exchanged letters. I helped him with the pronunciation of certain Yiddish or Hebrew words and their meanings."

When they met in Hamburg shortly afterward, Lemm asked Lehmann where he could find still more of Gebirtig's songs. Lehmann contacted a friend in London, a cantor, who had a thick dossier of songs, some of which had not been set to music.

Since then, from his base in the town of Wuppertal, Lemm has done wonders to popularize Gebirtig. He has produced four LPs and four cassettes and CDs and he has performed at festivals and in schools in Germany, Israel, Holland, Belgium, Britain, Austria, Switzerland and Poland. In addition, Lemm has published Mordechai Gebirtig: Jiddische Liede, a handsome volume of his life and work.

Manfred Lemm

Lemm claims he is not the only German singer who specializes in the Yiddish genre. Indeed, he pays generous tribute to German folk singers, notably the late Peter Rohland, who preceded him.

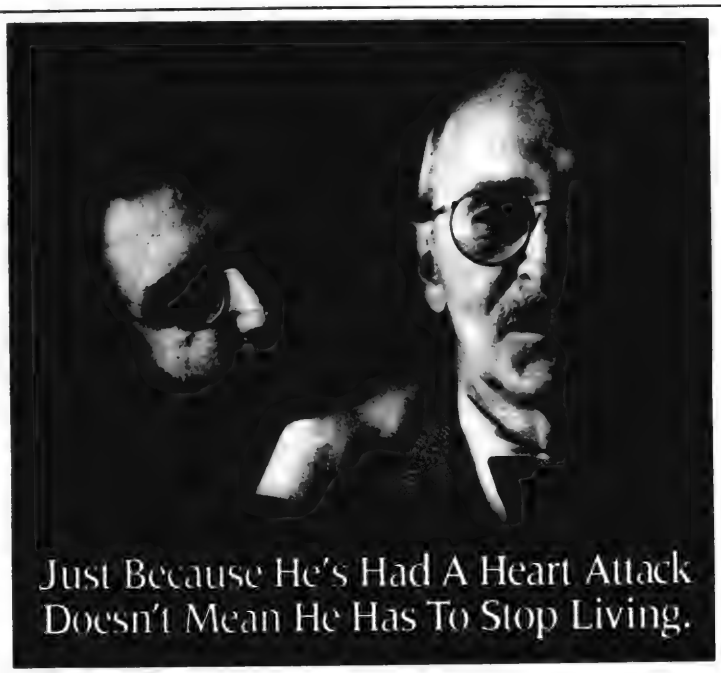
To this day, fans automatically assume he is Jewish. "I waste a lot of time explaining why, as a non-Jew, I sing Yiddish songs," said Lemm, who has occasionally plied his craft on cruise ships.

Lemm has always been warmly received by Jews in Israel and the Diaspora. "I'm especially gratified when people say, 'You brought our childhood back. We haven't heard these songs in 50 years."

In Germany, Lemm regularly gives school concerts, and through Gebirtig, launches into useful discussions about the Holocaust.

He has encountered little unpleasantness in the course of his tours. But once, in a cafe in Bochum, Germany, a Palestinian threatened him before leaving the premises.

In the future, Lemm hopes to organize a Yiddish folk festival in North America, where he is all but unknown and unsung. In the meantime, Lemm delights the rest of the world with his beautifully rendered renditions of Mordechai Gebirtig's musical gems.



Life doesn't have to end because someone you love has heart disease.

Now there's a new cardiac monitoring product and service that can warn about the possiblility of another heart attack.

It starts with the CardioBeeper®, a portable, state-of-the-art 12-lead Electrocardiogram unit (the same technology used in hospitals) which transmits your ECG via the telephone to an emergency monitoring centre, any time of the day or night.

There, trained specialists quickly assess your reading against your normal baseline ECG and any other relevant information you provide. If there is no cause for concern, you can resume your normal activities.

Should an irregularity be suspected, an ambulance is immediately dispatched, and all your medical information is faxed directly to the hospital.

That way you and your medical records arrive at the same time. So treatment can start faster.

If someone you love has already had a heart attack, or you know they're at risk, call 1 800 997 7888 for more information.

It could make life better for both of you.

RABBI IRVIN BRANDWEIN

Soon Jews will be greeting one another with the traditional New Year's wish of "Inscription in the Book of Life." Conversely, "Erasure or blotting out from the Book" constitutes the most obscene curse known to Jews anywhere. Indeed, since we were dubbed "People of the Book" (Arabic: Ahlu Al Kitab), that label has persisted.

This name imposes upon us a religious obligation to acquire Hebrew and to thereby confront God directly and without any intermediary, in every single word of the Torah. There we can also find our spiritual ancestors, along with everything which surrounded them. Moses and the prophets offer themselves daily as food to the living. Just partake and you will be sustained eternally.

The Hebrew for "book" (sefer) passed into Arabic as sifr, meaning "zero" and became the foundation for the great mathematical innovation of the Middle Ages, the decimal system. This liberated the West from the burdensome system of Roman numerals. Because the book is circular (a scroll), it has neither beginning nor end.

Sifr eventually came into English as "cipher" meaning "count" or "number." Oddly, the Hebrew verbs to "write" and to "count" are identical (sofer). The Talmud in Sanhedrin informs us that the Scribes (soferim) were those who counted every single letter in the Torah. Each letter has a numerical value and hence the Torah speaks mathematically as well as linguistically. An ancient work of Kabbalah (Sefirot), the Sefer Yetzira, begins with the enigmatic statement that the universe was created with three sefer(s): siffar, sippur and sefer.

For Jews, the Book is the universe and the universe is the Book. It must be interpreted and perpetually surrendered to each generation of Jews, along with the cultural keys necessary to decode and process its meaning. In Hebrew, this is called messorah: tradition (i.e. surrendering, registering and/or delivering a scroll with vowels or keys).

Since the entire universe is the "writing of God," it must be accessible and meaningful via reading and interpretation. Pagan gods were gods of action. They denigrated writing and despised the scribe. The Hebrew God writes and the Talmud refers to the Alphabet with which the universe was created (Berachot 55A).

Theodore Lessing remarked that if God were to declare that in His right hand He held the truth and in His left he had the investigation of the truth, Lessing would ask for the investigation of the truth. A truth that can be "dis-covered" or "un-veiled" excludes human participation. It cannot be a Hebrew truth. It is aletheia (Greek truth).

For Jews, truth or meaning is not part of the text. It must be generated by the reader sincerely confronting the Book. Perhaps herein lies our most profound difference with Christianity. By teaching that God's word (Logos) had become flesh, John was exchanging the writable logos of the Hebrews for the reveaing logos of the Greeks. Flesh is unwritable. In philosophical parlance, it is Apophansis. It can be contemplated, but unlike the Torah, it cannot be read or interpreted.

Everything in the cosmic book must have meaning and like any truly "great" writer, God must be everywhere present and also, simultaneously totally hidden! The unknowability of God is the precise distance which must separate every literary figure from his or her author (authority). God's warning to Moses: "You cannot see my face and live," expresses this absolute and mysterious distance.

As the summer progresses and the New Year approaches, let us join in the prayer of King David: "In thy book, Oh Lord, may all my members be written." (Psalms 139:16)

Learning a key dimension of Jewish faith, says rabbi

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The renaissance of the Jewish people depends on their learning "the deeper dimensions of our faith," said Rabbi Yitzhak Ginsburgh, a noted kabbalist, lecturer, teacher and rosh yeshivah.

Jews should "take pride in our own position. Then we would recognize the importance of our connection to our homeland and be able to give over that connection to the next generation."

This renaissance, he said, depends on "the spreading of the inner dimensions of Torah in the proper idiom for our times — one that touches the hearts and minds of our generation."

The American-born rabbi lives the philosophy he espouses in his own work in Israel. He is the rosh yeshivah of Od Yoseph Chai, at the tomb of Joseph in the ancient city of Shechem (better known as Nablus) in the Shomron.

Government policy does not allow Jews to sleep there overnight, he said. Students commute from nearby settlements, running the gauntlet of hostile Arab inhabitants.

Some of his students have also founded a kollel (a yeshivah for young married men) in Ma'arat Hamachpelah, the Cave of the Patriarchs in Hebron, and one in the Old Synagogue in Jericho.

"It is frightening," he told The CJN, "that people don't recognize that this is the heart of our homeland."

Rabbi Yitzhak Ginsburgh

Rabbi Ginsburgh was in Toronto for a series of mystical lectures held at the Anshei Minsk Congregation in Kensington Market. Besides spreading his teachings about kabbalah and Torah, he was raising funds for his yeshivot and his publishing house Gal Einai.

Every letter of the Hebrew alphabet, he told a spellbound audience of over 100, is of significance on many different levels. Each must be seen in the context of the world, of the divine soul of the Jewish people and of G-d.

Each letter, he said, is a channel for a part of creation. The letter zayin, which he used as an example of how one meditates on the letters, was the letter through which G-d created the month of Sivan.

Sivan is the month of the giving of the Torah, he explained, and zayin symbolizes the ascent of the Jewish people to accept the gift of the Torah from G-d.

The two letters surrounding zayin, vov and chet, together with zayin, represent the marriage of G-d and the Jewish people at Sinai. Vov, he said, represents G-d's coming down to meet the Jewish people. Chet is the chupah under which vov and zayin marry, the physical form of the chet being a combination of the zayin and vov under a bar.

Rabbi Ginsburgh traced the Zohar, the main book of the kabbalah, from the Baal Shem Tov, back to Rabbi Shimon Bar Yohai, to the prophets Elisha and Elijah, all of whom were taught by Achiya the Shilonite, who prophesied the splitting of the kingdom of Israel.

"Achiya must come back to prophesy the reuniting of the Jewish people, which is the precurser of the coming of the messiah."

Other lectures were about dreams and prophecy, the levels of love according to the Kabbalah and prayer and healing.

Jewish Life

Students embark on new paths

(Excerpts from the valedictory address at the commencement ceremonies of the 1995 graduating class of Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.)

By DAVID PREISS

Legend has it that when the chassidic Rabbi Zusya of Hanipoli lay on his deathbed, his pupils gathered round him and said, "Rabbi, Rabbi! After such a long life of piety and good works, a life surely equal to that of Moshe Rabeinu himself, surely you can now glimpse into the next world even as you lie here. Tell us, Rabbi, tell us: What questions will the angels ask you?"

After a long moment of silence the rabbi answered.

"My dear students," he said, "They will not ask me, 'Zusya, why were you not Moses?' Instead they will ask me, 'Zusya, why were you not Zusya?' "

The last line is at once cryptic and yet startlingly obvious in its meaning and implication. The story seems to suggest that the ultimate (if not the only) demand God places on us as Jews and human beings on Earth is that we merely be ourselves, that we be who we are and who we were meant to be. This, apparently, is the most important thing we can do in our lives, beyond even practising the virtues of piety and charity.

GUEST VOICES

Tonight as we look back over the past four years, we must remember that the education we have received, the education which our parents and teachers have worked so hard to give us, has been an education not simply for making a living, but rather for making a life. The two things may appear superficially similar, but they are not the same. One may make a very successful living and yet not feel theirs amounts to a life. A living comes from hard work, perseverance and a little luck; there is not one of us here who is not by now familiar with these things.

But a life is much more than the sum total of mere financial, social or political success; it is not what we do, but how we choose to do it. A life comes from, among many other things, the knowledge that one has lived well; from the knowledge that one has lived with sincerity, integrity and virtue; that throughout it all, one has remained as true to oneself as possible.

Without this crucial knowledge none of the other things we do in life can ever truly be enjoyed. We may achieve fame and success in the fields we enter, but if we do not feel it is really us doing these things, if we feel we have in the process sacrificed too much of ourselves and of who we are, then none of these things would have seemed worth it.

The path to true wisdom, Socrates once said, is to "know thyself;" but I believe it is more than just this. The sages teach us that we must also remain faithful to ourselves. Throughout these four years, we have learned the path to happiness consists not only in finding out who we are, but equally in remaining as true as we can to ourselves in our thoughts, in our words, in our actions.

As the example of Rabbi Zusya suggests, it is very difficult, if not impossible, for a person — even a pious rabbi — to remain constantly true to himself and to his ideals. Why? It sounds like the easiest and most self-evident thing to do — to be yourself in everything you do. How can one not be who one is?

But when you think about it, it is actually one of the most difficult challenges. Every day we are constantly bombarded by a myriad of conflicting forces tugging and pushing at us this way and that, compelling us to think or talk or act in a different way than we would like. The world is a battleground in which we struggle contantly against society's demands — the demands of parents, friends, family, teachers, employers, strangers — and in this battle we find ourselves without orders or instructions, unsure of how to fight. When is it right to give in and compromise? When is it right to refuse, to stand up for what we believe?

Our education has been exactly for this purpose; through our studies of Jewish History, literature and philosopghy at CHAT, we have, over the last four years, really been learning about ourselves, about who we are and where we come from, about those parts of us that we cannot, for our own sake and for the sake of our faith and people, let go. Tonight, we must each take stock of those things inside of us that are a part of who we are, and on which we will not and cannot compromise. As we go out into the world, we must each strive to strike a balance between the world and ourselves, a balance between change and constancy.

Hopefully our stay at CHAT has given us the tools with which to make this decision — the tools not just to succeed, but to be a success; not just to live well, but to live a good and happy life. If so, then these past four years will have been worth something money simply cannot buy.

Books

By Bernard Baskin

Readers Companion To The Twentieth Century Novel, edited by Peter Parker (Oxford University Press, $49.95).

Who are the prime Jewish novelists — writing in English — of the 20th century? This question is prompted by an exploration of this massive tome which reviews and evaluates some 750 novels by 400 writers. Chronologically arranged from Joseph Conrad's Lord Jim (1900), to The Stone Diaries by Carol Shields (1993), it is an invaluable and informative guide to modern fiction.

The Jewish novelists — and birth is the criterion rather than subject matter or sense of identity — include the following: Saul Bellow, Hortense Calisher, E. L. Doctorow, Elaine Feinstein, Nordine Gordimer, Joseph Heller, Dan Jacobson, Howard Jacobson, Erica Jung, Arthur Koestler, Jerzy Kosinski, Norman Mailer, Bernard Malamud, Chaim Potok, Mordecai Richler, Henry Roth, Philip Roth, Bernice Rubens, J. D. Salinger, I. B. Singer, Gertrude Stein, and Nathanael West.

Of course, there are other talented and well-known Jewish authors who might have been included. But it seems to me that no major figure has been omitted.

Which of all the books are the most Jewish in tone, feeling and subject matter? I would like to suggest these 10: Call It Sleep by Henry Roth, The Slave by I. B. Singer, Portnoy's Complaint by Philip Roth, My Name is Asher Lev by Chaim Potok, The Assistant by Bernard Malamud, The Painted Bird by Jerzy Kosinski, Herzog by Saul Bellow, Spring Sonata by Bernice Rubens, and The Rape of Tamar by Don Jacobson.

Arguably, the five novels by Jewish writers which have made the greatest impact and had the widest influence on modern readers are the following:

1. Catch 22 by Joseph Heller (1961). This book's attack on military idiocy, callousness and corruption, its black humor and moral imperative, made it widely popular as a pacifist protest against war. Published during the bloodletting in Vietnam, it articulated a widespread feeling of resistance to cruelty, injustice and political incompetence.

2. Herzog by Saul Bellow (1964). The anti-hero of this celebrated work is an intellectual professor who is caught up in a variety of dilemmas — both real and imaginary. He searches his memory for solutions out of his past, even as he writes numerous imaginary letters to a galaxy of personalities. Only when he is able to free himself from his fantasy world can he move from an emotionally charged and irrational life to a more reasoned and moderate one.

3. The Naked and the Dead by Norman Mailer (1948). The author's first novel is about a platoon of solidiers who form part of an invasion force in the Philippines during the closing stages of World War II. It is an unforgettable account of the conflict between man and his environment and the angst that inevitably results from his sense of mortality.

4. Portnoy's Complaint by Philip Roth (1969). The saga of sexually obsessed Alex Portnoy is told against the background of complex and painful family relationships. Widely praised and roundly denounced it occasioned wild laughter as well as indignation.

5. The Catcher in the Rye by J. D. Salinger (1951). This is the famous cult novel that aroused so much controversy. Numerous school boards regarded it as improper reading for young people. It is an archetypal tale of adolescent trauma and dissatisfaction as told by a precocious 16-year-old with a yearning for lost innocence.

Na'amat helps with shelter for abused women

MONTREAL — Na'amat Canada is attempting to raise $250,000 for a shelter and consultation centre for battered women, in a joint project with the city of Tel Aviv.

Na'amat is going 50-50 with the municipality's foundation on the construction of the centre — now underway — in the Maoz Aviv district.

The upscale location was chosen as a deliberate statement by the women's volunteer organization that the phenomenon of domestic violence should be out in the open, said Sharon Shenhav, director of Na'amat's overseas department in an interview during her recent cross-Canada tour.

Attitudes about domestic violence are changing only slowly in Israel and the issue is still surrounded by shame, she said. Shelters are normally located in poorer or out-of-the way parts of towns, and their existence kept confidential, she added.

The project, due to be completed in the fall, goes beyond providing refuge to battered women; it will also serve as a resource for professionals on domestic violence, studying the issue from various perspectives — legal, social and psychological. It will provide therapy to both the victims and the abusers, and a hot-line and support groups for women who do not want to leave home.

The 18-bed shelter and counselling centre are physically connected, but have separate entrances.

Although Na'amat is recognized for its expertise on the issue and its remedies, and indeed successfully lobbied for legislation in 1989 providing greater legal protection to abuse victims, the organization has traditionally taken the position that shelters are not the answer to domestic violence. "Our philosophy is that shelters are not the solution; they are only emergency stop-gaps," Shenhav said.

Na'amat believes that the most important thing to do about wife-battering is to regard it as a crime, with the abuser being removed from the home, rather than the victim. "This will send the message to society that this is not acceptable behavior," said Shenhav, a lawyer. Under the current law, a judge can order a man to leave his home for one week on the testimony of an abused woman.

The attitude of Israelis to wife-battering has evolved considerably since 1977 when members of the Knessets burst into laughter when the first proposal for domestic violence legislation was made, Shenhav said.

Shalom bayit — keeping peace in the home — continues to be seen as mainly the wife's duty, she said, and rabbis and others still tend to react to domestic violence by advising the woman to patch things up, insinuating that perhaps she is the one at fault.

Israelis started to take the matter more seriously when a woman was murdered by her husband in 1978. "His response was ' I don't understand why she died, she didn't when I beat her the other times,' " Shenhav said. The first shelter was opened that year with private money.

One of the biggest obstacles Na'amat continues to try to overcome is to convince women to press criminal charges against violent spouses because they feel ashamed, and Shenhav believes this harks back to the tradition that it is the woman's responsibility to keep peace in the home.

Clarification

In the photograph of the Kamin family which was published on page 15 in last week's issue, the identity of the woman standing next to Mrs. Buschie Kamin was omitted. That person was Ruth Chelin, Mrs. Kamin's daughter.

Shalom Village celebrates bar mitzvah year

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Close to 300 guests crowded into Shalom Village recently to celebrate its bar mitzvah year.

Since it opened in 1987, the 39-apartment seniors' residence has served as the model for other such institutions in the region.

"Shalom Village belongs to all of us and we're proud of it," said president Leslie Lasky in his welcoming remarks.

In 1970, a nursing home for Hamilton's Jewish seniors, as it was then envisaged, was still a dream for administrator Sheila Burman, then director of Jewish Social Services, and the late Ludwig Benario, an active volunteer.

But new concepts for the care of seniors were beginning to evolve, and plans for what became known as the Hamilton Jewish Home for the Aged underwent several changes before it opened as a residence with full support services.

Today, Lasky said, Shalom Village is not only "the finest in the region," but also "has the longest waiting list of any similar facility in the region."

Five years ago, an adjacent nursing home was opened. Benario's daughter, Ruth Goldberg, currently serves as its president.

Candles on a giant birthday cake were lit by representatives of the "visionaries" — past presidents, builders, major contributors and campaign leaders, families of residents, the rabbinate, staff, volunteers, residents, past and present board members, Lasky and Goldberg and special honoree, Sheila Burman, who received a standing ovation.

Master of ceremonies Paul Hanover kept up a brisk pace, refreshments were served and throughout, there was the catchy, toe-tapping music of a Klezmer trio led by Toronto composer and pianist, Rick Kardonne, who recently wrote the sound track for My Uncle Boris And His Russian Relatives, a TV movie produced by Cayle Chernin, to be shown on PBS next winter.

Playing with Kardonne were Joe Roth, violin, and Michael Sherman, clarinet.

Celebrations began Friday night with a festive dinner for residents, families and board members. On Saturday morning, a Shabbat service was followed by a special kiddush.

Likud MK warns of new terrorism

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The pullback of Israeli troops from key positions in Judea and Samaria, as spelled out in Phase 2 of the Oslo accords, will lead to a new spate of terror from Hamas, warns a leading Likud MK.

The second phase of the PLO-Israel agreement was to go into force July 1, and the 150,000 Jewish settlers in the territories are already manning the barricades, Tzachi HaNegbi told The CJN in an interview last week.

HaNegbi was in town to raise money for the settlers, whom he called Israel's "true fighters" and the "last barrier" against a Palestinian state on the country's doorstep.

If he wanted to, Palestinian Authority leader Yasser Arafat could crush Hamas in Gaza "in three days," but in the West Bank, Arafat is "incapable" of confronting the terror group, said HaNegbi, 38, an MK since 1988 and son of longtime MK Geula Cohen of the now-defunct Tehiya Party.

Hamas recently promised Arafat two months of peace and quiet so that he can assume control over the territories, after which a new terror campaign to oust Jews will begin, HaNegbi said, citing recent Israeli media reports.

Settlers "will face enormous problems" in the coming months and desperately need funds to buy emergency communications equipment and build bypass roads, he said.

It's "common knowledge" in Israel that the Labor government is ready for the country to return to its pre-1967 borders, even though most Israelis are dead against it, HaNegbi said. Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin "is ready for a total pullback" from the Golan Heights — the next major flash point in Israel, he added.

As for former foreign minister David Levy breaking with Likud and threatening to form his own party, "It was lucky for us that it happened 1½ years before the next election. That's more than enough time for any scars to heal."

HaNegbi feels Levy "miscalculated" in quitting Likud — something borne out by the fact that not one Likud MK went with him.

Levy's move will leave "no damaging" effects on Likud, and in fact, could hurt Levy.

"People are angry at him. They think the last thing Likud needs now are personal, egotistical matters."

Soviet activist sums up her experiences

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "We battled the great Soviet bear and won."

This is the way Wendy Eisen, author of Count Us In, the Struggle to Free Soviet Jews (Burgher Books, Toronto, hard cover, $29.95) summed up her experiences.

The launch of the book at Holy Blossom Temple recently was attended by some 300 people, who celebrated their own part in the liberation.

Mementoes of the struggle were displayed in the Philip Smith Hall — personal letters from Holy Blossom members to the president of the Soviet Union, petitions bearing hundreds of names, photos of the Vasilevsky and Tarshis families who were among those adopted by the temple.

Eisen, an activist herself, announced that proceeds of the sale of her book will go to help olim from Russia.

Interest in the fate of Jews still living in the former Soviet Union remains strong at the Holy Blossom. The book launch was sponsored by the temple's Minsk Project and Alan Garfinkel told of members who continue to visit synagogues and small communities there regularly to lead seders and teach Judaism.

Eisen named J.B. Salsberg, Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut, Ben Kayfetz and the late Rabbi Stuart Rosenberg as the four founders of the movement to free Soviet Jewry. She presented copies of her book to them, Ronni Rosenberg accepting for her late father.

Charles S. Chaplin, 84, a temple member and film distributor was also honored. He insisted that at least one Jew be freed from prison for every film contract he signed with the Russians.

Also honored was Genya Intrator, Canada's translator telephone link with Soviet Jews, whose own telephone line was being monitored by the KGB, according to Baruch Gur, former Jewish Agency head in Russia, who spoke at the launch.

Winter a leader in Hungarian Jewish community

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

Eugene Winter

TORONTO — From a young age, Eugene Winter displayed the selflessness, generosity of spirit and compassion for his fellow human beings that would characterize him for the rest of his life.

A key leader of the Hungarian Jewish community in Toronto, Winter died recently at Mount Sinai Hospital at the age of 85.

"He had an inspiration from the beginning of his life," recalled Rabbi Zolton Zagon, rabbi emeritus at the Beth Hazichoron Congregation, which Winter helped found.

"He loved Judaism. It was in everything he did," said Winter's son, Andrew. "He believed in it. He was God-fearing. He respected rabbis, the Torah. He didn't have any money, but he donated the first ark [for Beth Hazichoron]."

"He gave us the greatest gift," said Winter's older son, Gabriel. "He bequeathed the gift of enjoying life. He savored every moment of it. We savor every moment of it because of our father and because [he instilled] the idea that you are responsible for your family and for your fellow man."

A man who garnered numerous awards, Winter was honored last year with the Ontario Medal for Good Citizenship for his dedication to humanitarian causes in Canada. In 1958, he received a Letter of Appreciation from the United Nations for his efforts in organizing aid, medicine, employment and shelter for Hungarian refugees. In 1982, he was given the Jerusalem Medal by Mayor Teddy Kollek for his underground activities against the Nazis.

Winter's community involvement goes back even before World War II, to when he served as secretary of the Hungarian Jewish youth movement.

Early in the war, he was conscripted into a forced labor unit, but he escaped and joined partisan groups that fought the Nazis and their Hungarian counterparts.

"He was an incredibly brave man with no fear of injury or harm. He believed he was his brother's keeper," Gabriel said. "When he was in the labor unit, he stood up for all the people. He stood up to the guards and got severely beaten."

Following the war, his father dedicated himself to tracking down war criminals and served as president of the Anti-Fascist Organization. In 1946, in the city of Miskolc, backed by a few dozen Jews armed with machine guns, he faced down a mob of thousands bent on an anti-Semitic pogrom.

In 1948, Winter, his wife Maria and children Andrew and Gabriel fled the communists for Israel, where he helped found the town of Bat Shlomo, near Zichron Yaakov.

In 1951 they moved to Canada.

Gabriel remembers the early years in Toronto as one of constant organizational meetings and trips to Union Station at 2 a.m. to greet refugees fleeing Hungary.

"Our home was always full of people [some of whom] stayed for months," Gabriel said.

A laborer in a paper mill when he first came to Canada, Winter became a jewelry salesman.

"When he gave money away, my mother said, 'How can you do it?' He said, 'How can I not do it?' " Gabriel recalled.

"His job was his hobby. His love for his community was his job," Andrew added.

Winter was founder and first president of the Canadian Jewish Federation of Hungarian Descent, the Beth Hazichoron Congregation and the Toronto Hakoah Sports and Culture Centre.

He is survived by wife of 65 years, Maria, his sons and their wives Susan and Ildi, and grandchilden Ron, Don, Lisa and her husband Eddie, Lisa and her fiancee Jim, David and Mike and great-grandchild Chantal.

Emunah members gather

MONTREAL — Members from Halifax to Vancouver attended the 31st annual national convention of Emunah Women of Canada, held recently at the CBB Retreat & Vacation Centre in the Laurentians, north of Montreal.

Honored guests at the three-day convention were Dr. Carole Golding, chair of World Emunah, who flew in from Israel; Israel Consul General to Montreal Daniel Gal; Goldie Hershon, newly-elected president of Canadian Jewish Congress; and Dr. Rosalie Reich, president of Emunah of America.

Events organized by co-convenors Paula Dubrow of Montreal and Rochelle Balaban of Toronto, based on the convention theme, The Challenge and the Vision, included discussions on Strengthening Jewish Values, Leadership Skills and Bringing the Vision to Fruition.

Dorothy Zeifman, past president of Toronto Council, presented a report on the city's chapters.

Rena Schondorf was installed as president of Emunah Women of Canada, succeeding Miriam Novick, who continues to remain active with the organization.

Also elected were vice-presidents Rochelle Balaban, Toronto; Paula Dubrow, Montreal; Rivka Kraus, Ottawa; Erika Richler, Montreal; and Bea Rosenfield, Toronto. Chairman of the board was Sarah Bauer, Montreal; associate chairman, Judy Pachino, Toronto.

גידי קורן

מאוניברסיטת תל אביב

עם יד על הלב, כל אחד מאיתנו עוקב כל החיים מה קורה בבית הספר שלו, באוניברסיטה שבה למד ובקבוצת הכדורגל שהוא אוהד. את לימודי הרפואה השלמתי באוניברסיטת תל-אביב ברווח שבין מלחמת ששת הימים ויום כיפור. היתה זו, כמו שהיא גם עכשיו, אוניברסיטה ענקית, לא כל כך "אישית", כמו כוורת גדולה , וקשה היה לדעת איפה היא ממוקמת מבחינת תרמה שלה. לימים היא נדלה ועברה את האוניברסיטה העברית בירושלים מבחינת מספר הסטודנטים, אבל מאחר ורוב התלמידים ממשיכים לגור "בבית" ולא באוור האוניברסיטה, לא נוצרה שם מעולם האווירה הסטודינטאלית של ירושלים או באר-שבע.

כל מי שעוקב אחרי ההתפתחות הכלכלית המדהימה של ישראל בשנים האחרונות מודע לכך שיסוד ההצלחה הוא באיכות כוח האדם, ובעיקר בראש הישראלי. אנשים יכולים למצות את עצמם רק אם הם מקבלים חינוך אופטימאלי - והשילוב של ראש ישראלי יהודי עם אוניברסיטאות ובתי ספר טכניים מעולים - זה שם המשחק שיביא את ישראל לפיסגה בדור הבא.

סוף הסיפור הוא שביתי החליטה ללמוד באוניברסיטת תל אביב והיא מדווחת שהלימודים קשים ומפרכים , בדיוק כמו שהיו לפני שלושים שנה....

פול ברנארדו :

עכשיו לעניין מקומי. פול ברנארדו, רואה חשבון תעיר ונאה עומד למשפט על כך שבסיוע אשתו הצעירה והיפה חטפו, אנסו ורצחו שתי נערות בית ספר תיכון. קרוב לודאי שלעולם לא היו מוהים אותו אילולא המשיך להכות באישתו עד שחששה זו לחייה והחליטה לספר הכל במשטרה. וכדי להוכיח את הפשעים מעל לכל ספק - הסריטו בני חזוג את כל מעלליהם בוידיאו, ולאחר חיפושים נמצאו הסרטים אצל עורך הדין של מר ברנארדו....

שנים רבות מתנהל דיון ציבורי בכל המדינות הדמוקראטיות האם יש ערך בעונש המות. האם הוא מרתיע פושעים, האם ניתן להצדיקו מבחינה מוסרית וכו, וכו. אישית אני מאמין שאנשים כמו מר ברנארדו , שמעשיהם הוכחו מעל לכל ספק, חייבים להיות מוצאים ממעגל החיים. בכוונה אינני אומר שהם "חייבים לשלם על מעשיהם" משום שלפי מיטב הבנתי ברנארדו הוא איש סוטה ותולה מאוד ואין כל טעם "להעניש" אותו, ואין גם כל סיכוי שיחיה לעונש כזה ערך מרתיע. כל שנה חוננים פה אנסים ואנשים שהתעללו בילדים, ולא אחת הם חוזרים על מעשיהם ברגע שנוצרת ההזדמנות הראשונה. מה שיקרה זה שברנארדו ישב בכלא כל חייו ויעלה למשלם המיסים סכומים שיוכלו לתאכיל אלפי ילדים רעבים ולהקים בתים למאות אנשים חסרי גג. לרפואה אין אפילו קצה של הבנה איך פועל המוח של אנשים כאלה ומה לקוי בו, וממילא אין שום סיכוי שנוכל לתקן אותו. מטעמים אלה אני משוכנע שאנשים שאונסים ורוצחים ילדים ושמעשיהם הוכחו מעל לכל ספק אינם יכולים להמשיך לחיות. החלטה כזו איננה צייכה להיות אמוציונאלית או נקמנית ואני גם לא מאמין שהיא תרתיע את הסוטה הבא. גם הוא - אם ייתפס ויוכחו מעשיו בבית המשפט - אינו יכול להמשיך לחיות. תחשבו על זה.

רק ישראלי יבין :

מרים ילן שטקליס היתה משוררת /סופרת לילדים וכמעט כל ילד ישראלי גדל על ספריה. "עייפה הבובה זהבה/עייף מאוד הדוב... במיטה שוכבת נורית/אבא אבא היא קוראה....". הילדה נורית היתה קרובת משפחה של מרים ילן , וכמו סופרים רבים גם ילן הכלילה את מקורביה בשיריה. לפני כשלושים שנה הלחין שמוליק קראוס את השיר חנפלא הזה ושרו אותו "יהלונות הגבוהים" עם שמוליק , אריק איינשטיין וגיוזי כץ. והינה גיליתי עכשיו שנורית המקורית התאבדה לפני שנים, והיה לי נורא עצוב, כאילו שמת מישהוא שאני מכיר אישית.

Olmert stresses need for united Jerusalem

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jerusalem mayor Ehud Olmert, a vocal opponent of the peace process, stated his case for a united Jerusalem in an impassioned speech here last week.

"The world is happy for Israel to make peace as long as we sell out all our national treasures ... as long as we give, not get," Olmert told a crowd of 550 people paying tribute to Saul and Toby Feldberg at a dinner in support of the Jerusalem College of Technology (JCT).

"What we need more than anything else," he thundered, "is a strengthening of our understanding of where it all comes from." Olmert evoked poignant images of the longstanding religious and historical significance of the city.

He dismissed the notion of a divided Jerusalem as "a modern creation," pointing out that the city was divided for only 19 years, from 1948 to 1967.

The JCT was lauded by Olmert as a "perfect example" of what is needed in modern Jerusalem, because it both honors the past and develops the future.

The institution, established in 1969, offers four-year degree courses in high technology fields, along with a compulsory program in advanced Judaic studies. Its student population has grown from 15 to over 600 students.

Jerusalem is emerging as the "Silicon Valley of the Middle East," Olmert said. Hi-tech industry is growing rapidly there, and the JCT has made a major contribution, he added.

The dinner at the Inn on the Park Hotel marked the establishment of the Saul & Toby Feldberg Microcomputer Lab Centre at the school.

The JCT must grow, said its president, Joseph Bodenheimer, because the world, particularly Israel, is "hurtling forward from the age of technology to the age of super-technology." Electronic mail, he offered as an example, is "only a precursor" of the future of telecommunications.

The Feldbergs run The Global Group of Companies, Canada's largest manufacturer of office furniture. They also established Teknion Industries in Haifa, which supplies furniture in both Israel and Europe.

Feldberg spoke of his pride in being part of Israel's growing economy and helping to employ Russian immigrants. "We still cannot take prosperity for granted," he said. "We must lead by example so that our children will continue carrying the torch of peace for Israel and for the rest of the world."

Auschwitz photographs pose mystery

She believes this collection will serve as an important contrast to the pictures of emaciated, typhus-ridden survivors at Bergen-Belsen and those of the corpses stacked in front of the crematoria at Buchenwald.

"These 2,426 photos so forcefully convey vital and vibrant individuals, families and communities that were uprooted and rent asunder in the name of a ruinous racial ideology," Muller says.

Anyone with information about the Canadian photographs is asked to write to Sharon Muller, United States Holocaust Memorial Museum Photo Archives, 100 Raoul Wallenberg Place, SW Washington, D.C. 20024-2150, or fax her at 1-202-479-9726 or contact The Canadian Jewish News.

Tom Ungar elected president of JNF Toronto

Over 125 supporters attended the 1995 annual meeting of JNF Toronto in June at the Inn On The Park Hotel, where Ungar was elected president.

In their reports, outgoing president Patricia Alpert reviewed her three years in office; Ben Prossin presented a positive report as executive director; and Brig.-Gen. Doron Kadmiel, special Jerusalem emissary to JNF Toronto, outlined his department's special projects and announced that two days before the annual meeting a $2-million contribution had been finalized for two projects in Israel.

Treasurer Alvin Dickstein tabled the financial reports. Newly-appointed JNF Toronto chair for Jerusalem 3000, Frank A. Wilson, outlined plans for the celebrations.

Special awards presented were: The Bernard Bloomfield Medal, highest award for service to a JNF volunteer, was given to John and Rose Ziner for many years of service. The Esther and Eric Exton Educational Award went to Necha Jakubowicz, teacher and director of the Playlearn Preschool. The President's Medal was received by Alpert in recognition of her three years of outstanding service.

Alan I. Posluns remains honorary chairman of the board, while six vice-presidents were elected — Alvin Dickstein, G. Bud Eisenberg, Ron Hoffman, Sandy Posluns, Judith Shostack and Frank A. Wilson. Treasurer will be Robert Ziner and assistant treasurer is Brenda Cooper while Marvin Rosensheim will serve as secretary and Marilyn Berg as assistant secretary. Honorary counsel is Stephen Karr.

J.S.R. concept sweeps Toronto singles off their feet

June was a record-breaking month for new memberships a the Jewish Singles Registry o Toronto, and the rest of the summe looks great, so says director Rot Singer. In a little over two and a hal years the J.S.R. concept of letting members choose for themselves whc they would like to meet by viewing biography/profiles and photographs has swept Toronto singles with a passion. New members are joining on a daily basis, a good portion of which are referrals from friends who are already part of the J.S.R. Most new members are dating within a week or so of joining the service. IT IS THAT EASY! Memberships are expected to top the 800 member mark within days..

Another engagement

Mazel Tov is in the air as another J.S.R. couple will be walking down the aisle in just a few months. It has also been reported that two other couples will be announcing their engagements by summer's end. No doubt about it ... if you are looking to meet other Jewish singles, be it for friendship, dating, or even marriage, the time is now to register with the Jewish Singles Registry.

J.S.R. "guarantee" eliminates the risk factor

The majority of J.S.R. members never joined a dating service before and the J.S.R. guarantee makes signing up virtually risk free. In the event that a member has not received a minimum of six potential dates within the first year of membership, the Registry agrees to waive a member's second year renewal fee for a period of up to 12 months from the expiry of his/her first year's registration, or until the member has received six potential dates. There is virtually no risk in joining the Jewish Singles Registry of Toronto. You can contact the Registry office for details.

What's new ...

There is a lot of exciting things happening at the J.S.R. but just exactly what they are, Singer is keeping quiet about. "We are working on many new projects, both external and internal designed to put the J.S.R. in the forefront for the 21st century." he says. "A lot of time and effort has already been put into these projects and as soon as we are ready to announce them The Canadian Jewish News readers will be the first to know."

Open six days a week

Contacting the J.S.R. has never been easier. It is as simple as picking up your phone and calling Right Now. The Registry is open six days a week for your convenience including evening hours. If you don't reach them in person the first try, don't worry ... as their 24 hour a day answering system will accept messages on your behalf.

Deblins Linens offers cloud nine merchandise at silver lining prices

There's nothing quite like shopping for bedding and table linens. Given the right environment, you're transported into an almost Beatrix-Potter-like fairy-tale setting where everything is cozy and quaint — exactly as your home sweet home should be.

The Chitiz family, with some 47 years of experience in the linen trade, decided to create this environment on a grand scale when they opened a warehouse store at 39 Orfus Road in 1994. Their 10,000 square feet of space filled with quality merchandise merely enhances the fairy-tale atmosphere by making more of it — much more of every quality brand name available at the lowest prices imaginable.

You're sure to find exactly what you need in a fantastic range of bedding, table linens and bathware. Want sheets? Among others, they carry Croscill, Wamsutta, Revman, Crown Craft, Martex, Carrington, Springmaid, Fieldcrest, and the Veratex line which is printed in Israel. If it covers a bed and it's good quality then Deblins has it, in a full range of sizes, patterns and colours. Pillow coverings, duvets and duvet covers are stocked in abundance, always first quality — headlined by white Canadian down goose duvets, in all weights and sizes, at exceptional prices with a host of complementary coverings.

Fieldcrest Royal Velvet in 22 colours

Want towels? How about Fieldcrest Royal Velvet in over 22 colours, always at rock-bottom prices. Want tablecloths, napkins, napkin rings and table pads for your sabbath table or for everyday dining? Deblins has all the top names, always in stock at the lowest prices anywhere.

Your sabbath table well covered

Just because Deblins is big, however, doesn't mean they've forsaken the small-store service that has driven the company's success. All your questions related to product and fabric care will be promptly and expertly answered, and in the rare instance where you don't find exactly what you need in stock, Deblins will be happy to order it for you or custom make it at an excellent price.

Deblins also offers a wide assortment of ready-made draperies that will beautify your home in the traditional way, and their expert staff will be more than happy to assist you with all the details of colour coordination and hardware.

For the bathroom, you'll find shower curtains, linens, mats, and the aforementioned huge selection of towels.

Many stores talk low prices, but Deblins delivers. Proof is the fact that they don't even give discounts to designers, so you know that a Deblins price is the lowest price.

"Price, quality and service are the cornerstones of our business, and we offer all three, every day. When you walk through our door, we don't expect you to compromise. We do expect that you will walk out with the quality merchandise you want at the lowest price anywhere."

Another silver lining in Deblins linen chest is the fact that they don't sell junk. No irregulars, no seconds that won't make it through the wash. "What's the benefit of getting low prices if you're also getting inferior quality?" asks President Ellis Chitiz.

In addition to their Superstore at 39 Orfus Road, Deblins has stores in The Promenade Mall at Bathurst and Centre Street and in the Mississauga Home and Design Centre for your shopping convenience.

IF YOU FIND A BETTER PRICE ANYWHERE ELSE,

BUY IT.

A lot of stores today offer a price guarantee. That means if you find a lower price anywhere else, they'll match it. So after running around to find a better price, all you're left with is the option to pay the same price somewhere else.

But isn't the best price what you're really looking for? Then shop at Deblins Linens. We don't match prices. Our goal is to offer you the lowest price in the first place. Sure, you might find an odd item at a lower price in another store, but don't come rushing back to Deblins to pay the same price. Just buy it.

We're confident that when you compare both quality and price, nine times out of ten you'll get the better deal at Deblins .... not just the same deal.

Anorexia treatment sought

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Ifat, a 20-year-old Israeli who is suffering from anorexia nervosa, recently came to Victoria with her family to seek treatment at the Montreux Counselling Centre, a private facility.

The family read about the centre in Yediot Achronot, an Israeli daily, and brought the girl here with the hope she can be cured of the ailment, which has plagued her for four years.

The girl has received psychological counselling in Israel and has been hospitalized several times for IV feeding, but nothing has helped her regain her health, says a friend, Sara Thoms, who is attempting to raise funds to help pay for Ifat's treatment.

Thoms is a former Israeli who has lived in Victoria for five years. "If she remained in Israel, Ifat would have to be committed to a psychiatric unit and be treated as a mentally unstable person, forced to eat and be medicated. Girls who have been institutionalized in Israel for anorexia have not received appropriate care and some have died as a result," said Thoms.

Thoms told The CJN Ifat weighed 48 kilograms when she came here and Montreux cared for her for a while.

"During that time she was persuaded to eat — something her family and friends are unable to do."

The Montreux Centre says Ifat's heart is very weak and her condition is "extremely serious."

A Montreux brochure says the centre's treatment for anorexia is based on a "workable premise of total recovery, even in the most serious eating disorder cases," providing care on a one-to-one 24-hour-a-day basis.

The centre was established by Peggy Claude-Pierre, as a result of her success in treating her own two daughters who suffered from anorexia in their teens.

Victoria Jews have raised funds to help Ifat and sent out appeals to other areas. For information or to help, contact Congregation Emanu-El in Victoria, B.C.

Author finds racism in polite society

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "Be worried. Be very, very worried" read the cover of a recent U.S. magazine about the threat posed by terrorists using nuclear, chemical or biological weapons.

Though she has given her book a less sensational title, The Invisible Empire: Racism in Canada, (Random House), author Margaret Cannon believes there are plenty of reasons for concern about the appeal of the racist right in Canada.

Racism is a pervasive underlying current in Canadian society which is not limited to the loud aggressive posturing of groups like the Heritage Front, she said.

Inside corporate boardrooms, in clubs and in dinner conversation in polite society, a perceptive observer can still see the ugly face of prejudice. Anti-Semitism, "the most enduring hatred," still exists, if not in its more virulent forms, she said.

Today, codewords mask underlying animosity. She has heard the term "nouveau Jew" used to describe a decorating style, and a prominent Toronto Jewish lawyer called "loud, flashy, showy" by a non-Jewish colleague.

Jews should not get too complacent about their place in Canadian society, Cannon asserts. They shouldn't make the same mistake made in Austria and Germany 60 years ago, when Jews believed they'd broken down occupational barriers, had prestige and were considered loyal citizens.

Cannon's thesis is that dominant groups in various societies often set themselves apart from "the other" — minorities who can be treated as convenient scapegoats when times get tough.

The first hatred of the other in western societies is the contempt for Jews, she continues. "On to that [the racist right] grafts all their other hatreds; anti-gun laws, 'feminazis'; people taking their jobs; people taking over the country."

Cannon presents a comprehensive survey of the racist scene in Canada. But instead of merely outlining the who's who of Canadian racists, she attempts to delve into "the strange circuitry of the racist mind."

A native of Hot Springs, Ark., Cannon inserts herself into the book. "I went to the Heritage Front [event] and found myself in the place I was born to, a white woman, a mother and grandmother, with 18-year-olds patting me on the head," she writes.

In her youth, Arkansas was an openly racist and segregated society, she recalled. Armed Ku Klux Klan men paraded in the streets of Little Rock and her father "went to his grave believing that blacks were inferior beings, [but] as a sop to me, he stopped using the word 'nigger'."

Air Canada's inaugural Israel flight a success

By DONALD CARR

TEL AVIV — The landing of Air Canada's first flight to Israel on June 21 caused a stir, not only at Tel Aviv's Ben-Gurion Airport, but on radio and TV, in newspapers and on the street. For at least a short time, an Israeli public bent on as much Americanization as possible, understood that Canada is a separate country, distinguishable from its neighbor, the United States.

As the full Boeing 767 touched down, it was greeted on the tarmac by a band, colorful flags, food and drink and a welcome from Eli Gonen, director-general of the Israel Ministry of Tourism and from Norman Spector, Canada's ambassador to the state.

In an emotional response, Jean-Jacques Bourgeault, executive vice-president and chief operating officer of Air Canada, who had travelled on the inaugural flight with his wife Manon, expressed enthusiasm for his airline's new venture and his great satisfaction that the regularly-scheduled service had come to fruition.

The gleaming white 767 bore Air Canada's new colors, with its red maple leaf on the navy blue tail. On the fuselage, near the nose of the plane, was the blue stylized Magen David, partly in the shape of a dove of peace, the symbol of tourism for this year.

The departure lounge at Pearson Airport prior to take off had been converted into an Israeli celebration, complete with falafel stands, balloons, an Israeli folksinger and a great deal of gaiety. Even passengers from the adjacent Royal Jordanian Airlines flight to Amman sampled the falafel.

On board the special flight were several community invitees, including Goldie Hershon, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, with her husband Sheldon; Brian Morris, president of B'nai Brith Canada, and his wife Harriet; Stephen Victor, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, and his wife Gail; Jack Silverstone, executive director of Congress, and his wife Ann; B'nai Brith executive vice-president Frank Dimant with his wife Florence; Steve Ain, executive vice-president of UIA of Canada; Rob Ritter, executive director Canada-Israel Committee, with his son Matthew; Florence Simon of the Canadian-Zionist Federation and her husband David; Ted Zacks, vice-president, Council of Jewish Federations of Canada; Drew Staffenberg, executive director Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver, and his wife Kriss; and this writer with his wife Judy Feld Carr.

Ruth Ben-Tzur, tourism director of the Israel government tourist office in Toronto; Robert Mildon, senior vice-president, marketing and in-flight service for Air Canada, and his wife Lizanne also were on the flight. Kym Robertson the airline's manager of corporate communications, had travelled ahead of time to meet the flight and she was primarily responsible for all preparations in Tel Aviv.

Those who flew in the executive first class seats enjoyed the now-famous facilities and service which make Air Canada virtually unique in overseas flights. Passengers in hospitality class expressed satisfaction with the seat space and the service on the 11-hour non-stop flight.

Spector held a welcoming reception at his home in Savyon for the Air Canada executives, crew and flight guests; and the airline, in conjunction with the Ministry of Tourism, provided six days of hospitality and "off the beaten track" touring.

At a farewell dinner prior to the return to Canada of the Air Canada executives and guests on June 26, Bourgeault, who had made his first visit to Israel, said he would return to Canada "a different person" as a result of his experiences in this country during the short stay. He — as well as other executives — vowed to return.

The airline is pleased with passenger response and is happy at the level of bookings. The first flights from Tel Aviv to Toronto are heavily booked with Israeli passengers.

The availability of non-stop flights from Toronto to Tel Aviv on Air Canada is an appealing one. Other airlines require the traveller to change planes in Europe or to take a different flight, which during most of the year, stops in Montreal and/or New York.

The writer is the president of The CJN.

Rabbi Schneerson remembered

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — More than 700 Lubavitcher Chassidim came to Washington last week to remember their late spiritual leader, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, and see him posthumously awarded the United States' highest civilian honor, the Congressional Gold Medal.

The Rebbe's followers came from all over the world, from as close as New York and from as far as South Africa and Australia, to join in the celebration.

The first anniversary of Rabbi Schneerson's death, which fell on July 1, was marked with tributes and ceremonies around the world.

Throughout the day, congressional leaders, including Speaker of the House Newt Gingrich and Benjamin Gilman, chair of the House International Relations Committee, paid tribute to the Rebbe.

Gingrich, who helped spearhead legislation to honor the Rebbe with the medal, praised Rabbi Schneerson for not only believing in his ideals, but for living them.

Gilman, who sponsored an international lunch for the gathering, said the medal "honors the life and teachings of the Rebbe."

A banquet featuring a musical tribute by violinist Itzhak Perlman and the presentation of the medal capped the day.

Nearly 60 members of Congress, along with Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel and 700 Lubavitchers, attended the gala, where Rabbi Abraham Shemtov of Philadelphia, the national director of the Friends of Lubavitch, accepted the award.

Israel, PLO still at impasse two years after peace deal

MIDEAST ANALYSIS

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Nearly two years after the formal signing of the Declaration of Principles (DoP) in Washington, Israel and the PLO are still at loggerheads over fundamental issues.

As a result of this impasse, they are one year behind schedule in carrying out the terms of their historic agreement.

Indeed, Israel and the PLO may miss a crucial deadline — the second phase of Palestinian autonomy, which encompasses the redeployment of the Israeli army in the West Bank and the holding of accompanying elections there.

But an interim accord, designed to appease the Palestinians, may be in the offing. The Palestinians would drop their demand for a full-blown agreement by this week. In exchange, Israel and the PLO would negotiate the transfer of all remaining spheres of civil authority in the West Bank, while Israeli soldiers would withdraw from the West Bank towns of Nablus, Tulkarem, Kalkilya and Jenin.

Even if this compromise proves acceptable to the PLO, the Palestinians will demand a speedy Israeli withdrawal from the rest of Palestinian urban centres, notably Ramallah, Bethlehem and Hebron.

The chances of that happening are slim unless the Palestine National Authority (PNA), based in the Gaza Strip, shows greater success in curbing terrorism — the Achilles heel of the DoP. An Israel evacuation will also be contingent on the completion of bypass roads to Jewish settlements, inhabited by upwards of 140,000 settlers whose fate will be determined in the final phase of negotiations.

The picture turns even cloudier now that Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin has indicated that Israel reserves the right of access to Palestinian towns, even after the planned withdrawals. PLO chairman Yasser Arafat is bound to object to this condition as an infringement of Palestinian sovereignty.

Another problem revolves around the eventual "empowerment" of the PNA in about 30 jurisdictions of self-rule. To the chagrin of the Palestinians, Israel demands veto power in several sensitive areas, principally water resources and the use of state lands. The success or failure of the DoP may hinge on the resolution of these disputes.

The thorny question of Palestinian elections poses yet another hazard. In light of its claim to the eastern half of the city, Israel stands firm in its refusal to allow Arabs from East Jerusalem to run for office or to cast ballots within East Jerusalem's municipal boundaries. The PLO rejects these conditions.

The PLO's National Covenant — which calls for Israel's destruction — is an additional bone of contention. Due to divisions within the PLO and a sense of disillusionment with the results of the DoP, Arafat has reneged on his promise to amend the covenant. Israel wants to settle this matter expeditiously. But it may linger on for a while yet.

As recent clashes in Nablus, Ramallah and East Jerusalem indicate, the presence of Palestinian prisoners in Israeli jails is an endemic source of tension. In 1993, Israel promised to release 10,000 Palestinian detainees. So far, about half have been freed, causing deep resentment among Palestinians.

Unless these obstacles are cleared away expeditiously, the full implementation of the DoP will not be possible.

Russian mafia infiltrates Israel

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM — The Russian mafia has laundered $4 billion (US) in Israel in recent years, and is trying to infiltrate everything from businesses to political parties, Police Insp.-Gen. Assaf Hefetz said last Wednesday on returning from a trip to Russia, Ukraine and Hungary.

"Police action is not enough. It will take a combined effort of the law enforcement, immigration and tax authorities to contain the Russian mafia," said Cmdr. Yossi Levy, who accompanied Hefetz.

Russian criminals are entering Israel either as immigrants or with the help of immigrants, and the Law of Return needs to be reexamined to prevent this from continuing, the two officers said.

While stopping short of saying it needs amending, Hefetz and Levy said the Law of Return allows for authorities to take steps to prevent those with criminal records from entering Israel.

Levy said Russian authorities have agreed to help Israeli police check out potential immigrants to see whether they are connected to organized crime.

Police are also recommending that legislation be passed to prevent the laundering of money here, by requiring investors to declare the source of their finances.

Hefetz repeated a warning already sounded by Police Minister Moshe Shahal that the Russian mafia is threatening to infiltrate Israel's political system.

"The fall of the Soviet empire opened up the borders to the Russian mafia," according to Hefetz, who said some 300 major criminal gangs operate in the former Soviet state.

The gruesome double murder of a Russian immigrant grandmother and grandson in Ramat Aviv earlier this month was mafia-related, Hefetz said.

A special squad of 20 detectives has been set up to deal exclusively with organized crime in Israel.

Feinberg gets ready for bone marrow transplant in Seattle

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

NEW YORK — The bone marrow transplant for Jay Feinberg, the 26-year-old New Jersey man diagnosed with leukemia four years ago, and for whom clinics have been held across Canada, is due to take place next week at the Hutchinson Cancer Research Centre in Seattle.

In its worldwide search for a compatible donor, the Feinberg family raised $2.5 million and helped save the lives of over a dozen people who located bone marrow donors through their blood drives, including several held in Israel.

In January 1993, thousands of would-be donors flooded Jerusalem hotels to have their blood tested. Similar blood drives were sponsored by the Friends of Jay Foundation throughout the United States.

But since Feinberg has a very rare human lymphocyte antigen (HLA) type, the family could not find a perfect match, or even a similar one.

Recently, an American woman who was tested in a Friends of Jay blood drive was found to have a compatible type — not a perfect match but close enough to give Feinberg a good chance of a complete cure.

The young woman — whose identity may not be revealed until after the procedure is completed due to American confidentiality laws — will donate a spoonful of bone marrow aspirated from her hip under anesthetic, and then go home a few hours later.

She is apparently Jewish, as the specific HLA type is more common among Eastern European Jews from the same background as the Feinberg family, who are from Belarus and the Warsaw area.

And a lot has to be done yet if we want to bridge these gaps."

Kedusha ketana tactic answered

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — In a dramatic ruling seemingly from beyond the grave, and with a distinct Canadian angle, one of the world's foremost experts on Jewish law has declared that a young girl whose father secretly married her off is free from the vow of betrothal made by her father.

Rabbi Shlomo Zalman Auerbach, one of the few halachic leaders who could claim authority in almost every corner of the Orthodox Jewish world, died in February 1995.

But in August 1994, several months before he passed away, he ruled that Sarah Leah Goldstein is not bound by the marriage or in need of a Jewish divorce because her father had not produced the witnesses necessary to legitimize his vow.

Practice widely condemned

In 1993, Sarah's father, Israel Goldstein, of the Borough Park area of Brooklyn, N.Y., revived a long-unused practice called kedusha ketana, in which a man acts as his minor daughter's proxy and marries her off [CJN, June 15].

Goldstein's act, believed to be the first time that anyone had used kedusha ketana in a malevolent way, was part of an effort to punish his estranged wife, sources say. His wife has been trying to obtain a get (Jewish divorce decree) from Goldstein for five years.

Goldstein, who married off his daughter when she was 11, has refused to name the groom and the two male witnesses required to make a marriage legal.

Word of Rabbi Auerbach's ruling comes as other Orthodox authorities, including the Council of Torah Sages of the Agudath Israel of America, an organization representing Orthodox Jews, have been issuing statements strongly condemning the practice, as did Toronto's Vaad Harabanim.

It comes also as the New York district attorney, Charles Hynes, is considering whether to bring charges against Israel Goldstein for endangering the welfare of a minor, and as Sarah's mother, Gita Goldstein, and her attorney consider filing a civil suit against him.

Despite the outcry, Rabbi Auerbach was the first widely respected authority to have found a way within Halachah to invalidate the unions.

His decision is expected to nullify the acts of any men similarly marrying off their daughters and to deter those considering such a step.

"It's a terrible, terrible weapon that's been destroyed" with the Rabbi Auerbach ruling, said Rabbi Eliahu Rominek of Queens, N.Y., a Torah scholar who brought the Goldstein case to Rabbi Auerbach's attention last August and authored the legal response that Rabbi Auerbach approved.

There is believed to be only one other publicly known case of kedusha ketana (marriages of minors) in the last few years — that of Suri and Yossi Sharashefsky's daughter in Brooklyn. However, Yossi Sharashefsky did not have his act validated by a religious court as Israel Goldstein did.

As a result, several Orthodox rabbis have said they do not consider it to be as serious a concern as the Goldstein case.

Other cases are rumored to have taken place, though no names have been connected to them.

A representative of a secretive group that calls itself the Sholom Bayis Organization said in an interview that it has distributed hundreds of copies of a booklet called the Kedusha Ketana Handbook, explaining how fathers can marry off their daughters. The group said it intends to distribute 10,000 copies.

Gita Goldstein, who only learned of the Rabbi Auerbach ruling through a reporter last week, welcomed the news but remains concerned about its widespread acceptance.

"I am relieved, so relieved. This is like an enormous weight is off me, but I am still concerned that it's not the end," she said from her home in Montreal. "It's not over, it's not finished, because people could still question the validity."

Goldstein has sole custody of both her daughter and her son, David Aron, who is 10, because her husband did not ask for custody or visitation or show up for any of their custody hearings, she said.

Attempts to reach Israel Goldstein were unsuccessful.

Gita Goldstein had been working with two Montreal rabbis to resolve her daughter's plight.

In May 1994, the local Montreal rabbis turned to Rabbi Rominek, a scholar of Torah, for help. Rabbi Rominek researched the issue, wrote up a tshuvah (Jewish legal response), and then asked leading rabbinic authorities, all of whom are based in Jerusalem, to rule on the issue.

All but Rabbi Auerbach declined to address the issue, he said.

The posek (decider of Jewish law) studied the issue for a week and, according to Rabbi Rominek, on August 7, 1994, told him the girl is not bound to the marriage.

Rabbi Auerbach then told Rabbi Rominek to inform the Montreal community about his decision and to have anyone who questioned it call him in Jerusalem.

Rabbi Rominek said he told the Montreal rabbis of Rabbi Auerbach's decision but they did not spread the word, and several months later Rabbi Auerbach died.

Rabbi Rominek said he feels confident that Rabbi Auerbach's decision will not only free Sarah Leah Goldstein from a life of misery, but that it will also deter other men from trying the same thing.

"I expect it to be authoritative throughout the frum (religious) world," he said. "You'll always have some people griping, but overwhelmingly, it will be received with great joy and confidence."

Dear Ella,
My mother lives with me and my husband. She is quite old and not in the best of health. Although she does not need to be under constant supervision right now, I don't think by next year that will be the case. I think she should put an application in to a number of seniors homes so that her options are open to her if and when the time comes. I don't know how to approach the subject without her feeling I'm trying to get rid of her.
Nervous

Dear Nervous,
Don't be! Your mother is probably concerned about her future as well. Bring it up with her in such a way that she understands it is only an application and not something she needs right at the moment. Explain that it is only one option but that it has to be done far in advance. She will probably understand and maybe even be grateful that you are planning for her future years. You may also want to consult a Jewish community agency on this matter, as they probably have counselling to handle just such an issue.

Dear Ella,
What is it with women and bugs! Why is it that my wife is always waking me from the best dream to kill a spider, or my secretary wants me to conquer the bee that flew in the window, or my mother wants me to get the enormous bug that might as well be a mammal out of her kitchen sink. Why is it my job? I hate bugs!
Bugged by Bugs

Dear Bugged by Bugs,
Most men are just as uncomfortable with bugs as women are ... but society dictates that you have to kill those bugs! It's been that way since the beginning of time. You used to hunt dinosaurs, you used to kill sheep for sacrifices, now you're killing bugs ... So stop kvetching and be happy you're not squashing a dinosaur under that rolled up TV Guide. Remember, if more men did their bug job properly, there would be fewer bugs for us women to find!

Walesa fails to satisfy U.S. Jewish leaders

By NATALIE WEINSTEIN
Jewish Bulletin of Northern California

SAN FRANCISCO — Disappointed that Polish President Lech Walesa again refused to condemn a priest for making anti-Semitic remarks, U.S. Jewish officials said last week they plan to keep a closer eye on Poland's attitudes toward Jews.

Leaders from the American Jewish Committee (AJC) and the San Francisco-based Jewish Community Relations Council met privately with Walesa for 40 minutes last Monday afternoon here. Walesa was visiting the city for the 50th anniversary celebration of the United Nations.

Jewish officials hoped the Polish leader would finally condemn the anti-Jewish comments made by his old friend Rev. Henryk Jankowski last month in Gdansk, Poland (CJN, June 29).

"The meeting was inconclusive. We do not feel satisfied," said Rabbi Andrew Baker, the AJC's director for European affairs.

In a sermon attended by Walesa, Rev. Jankowski said the Star of David is "implicated in the swastika as well as the hammer and sickle." He added: "We can no longer tolerate being governed by people who have not declared whether they come from Moscow or Israel," and he urged Poles to "wake up" to "Jewish dangers."

Though Walesa called the incident "shameful" and "nightmarish," Jewish leaders said the president didn't go far enough to allay their fears about an upswing of open anti-Semitism in Poland.

The priest later denied he was an anti-Semite, but at the same time accused Jews of "satanic greed" that led to communism and World War II.

Walesa at first refused to repudiate the remarks and waited until intense pressure from Israeli, American and Polish Jews forced him to respond nine days after the sermon. He then condemned anti-Semitism, but only in general terms.

Before meeting with Jewish leaders at the Veterans War Memorial Building, Walesa also met privately with U.S. President Bill Clinton for about 40 minutes.

Clinton stressed the need for democratic leaders to fight anti-Semitism, an administration official said. Walesa reportedly responded that he had no tolerance for anti-Semitism.

Walesa was not available after the meeting to comment, and Poland's U.S. ambassador, who was also visiting San Francisco, did not return several calls.

"Frankly, we had hoped for more to come out of the meeting," said the AJC's David Harris. "From our point of view, there was a hope we could help President Walesa understand why we were hurt by the whole episode and disappointed in his handling of it."

Nonetheless, Walesa promised the Jewish entourage he will "be available" to deal with future anti-Semitism and conceded he may have handled the situation the "wrong way."

But Rabbi Baker called Walesa's condemnation of anti-Semitism "somewhat disembodied" and added that Walesa still did not adequately explain why he had not confronted the priest's remarks immediately.

Walesa told the Jewish officials he wasn't paying attention to the "long, boring sermon" and that some of the priest's remarks were made to reporters after the sermon. Walesa also told them that he shouldn't be expected to react to every anti-Semitic statement made in Poland, and that a personal statement was unnecessary because Polish Catholic bishops had already condemned it.

"He gave half a dozen explanations that were contradictory," Rabbi Baker said.

Though last Monday's meeting ended without resolution, AJC officials will meet soon with the Polish ambassador to explore ways to improve relations between Poles and Jews and to avoid anti-Semitism within the Polish presidential campaign.

Rabbi Baker added that some good still might come from the publicity that swamped Walesa after this recent incident.

"I don't want to rule out that he didn't learn from this."

IDF document leaked

[Cont'd. from page 1]

The document appeared to back away from Israel's demands that an early warning station be maintained on the Golan and that security and demilitarization arrangements not be equal on both sides of the new border.

It also appears to presume a full Israeli withdrawal from the Golan Heights as part of a peace agreement with Syria.

Rabin and other officials denied that any of these inferences represented Israel's actual negotiating position in the talks Shahak conducted with Syria's Chief of Staff Lt.-Gen. Hikmat Shihabi.

Negotiations, which concluded with a meeting with U.S. President Bill Clinton last Thursday, were the first substantive talks between Israel and Syria since December.

Shahak told reporters after his meeting with Clinton and Shihabi there was "no understanding" on any of the central issues.

"But there is understanding on the need for more discussions and for each side to further explain its positions and concepts to the other," he added.

Terming the talks "extraordinary" and "unprecedented," U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher said the discussions focused on three main topics: early warning systems, confidence-building measures and zones of separation.

Israeli officials said the two sides had agreed in principle on the need for all three elements, but no specifics had been decided.

Reports from Washington said Shihabi had rejected Shahak's proposal for immediate confidence-building measures, such as a hot line between the two army commands and prior notice of military exercises.

The Syrian position is that such advances can come only in the context of an overall agreement.

Israeli sources said the atmosphere was businesslike and cordial throughout the three days of meetings, and that the two sides had exchanged some corridor conversation.

There were no posed handshakes for the official U.S. cameras, and the Syrians refused to admit Israeli camera crews.

Shihabi told Clinton the talks had been "very serious."

Editor rides the wave of a new medium

Evan Solomon

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — At 27, Toronto-born Evan Solomon is generating waves in the electronic media.

Founding editor of Shift, a media lifestyle magazine sold on newsstands across Canada, Solomon also hosts FutureWorld, a half-hour show about emerging technologies that airs on CBC NewsWorld Saturdays at 8 a.m., 1 p.m. and 11 p.m.

"This is a tremendously exciting moment we're living in," says the former USDS student who studied English literature and religious studies at McGill.

"We're witnessing the birth of a new medium. For the first time, the information age is penetrating into the popular culture. Our magazine couldn't have existed five years ago."

Solomon and two partners started Shift three years ago as a "labor of love," he says. Then he went to Hong Kong to work as a reporter for the South China Morning Post. "I really wanted to live in Asia," he explains. "The deal I made with the guys was that if Shift was still operating after a year, I'd come home."

Despite a high failure rate among new magazines, Shift managed to stay alive. Today it boasts a healthy circulation of 27,000 and a general readership of some 60,000 across Canada. The April/May issue offers features on VJ Sook-Yin Lee of the MuchMusic TV network, outlaw computer hackers and the media's handling of the flesh-eating virus.

Filled with stark computer-age graphics and idiomatic technoprose, Shift is geared to people wired into the Internet. "From an age perspective, our primary market consists of people from 22 to 34 years old, and then we skew up. A lot of people are interested in the effects of media on culture," says Solomon.

However, his busy work schedule does not allow him much time to explore cyberspace. "I don't really surf the Internet," he confesses. "I check my e-mail each morning and throughout the day, but I only use the net when it's needed. I don't surf it for pleasure. I don't have time for that, any more than I would run through a library looking for good books."

Solomon has recently helped to establish Shift Online, an electronic magazine featuring editorial information and advertisements from corporate sponsors like Molson and Smirnoff. He is also involved in developing a series of Shift Media Minutes, 90-second spots for FutureWorld "very much like the Heritage minutes you see on TV."

Though absorbed with futuristic technology, Solomon wisely refrains from making predictions about the Internet.

One thing Solomon says is here to stay is e-mail, "a really effective means of communication." He predicts the new technologies will continue to gain ground. "They say that 50 per cent of Canadian homes now have a computer. I think they'll be as ubiquitous as the television. They'll find ways to integrate into our daily lives."

New CD for Turofsky: Riki Turofsky, a Toronto-based singer, recently released a new CD, A River So Long, which she is marketing independently through the computerized telephone network known as the Internet. According to Toronto Star entertainment columnist Sid Adilman, the CD is the first in Canada to ride the information highway.

The daughter of the late sports photographer Lou Turofsky, Riki was an accomplished athlete at Forest Hill Collegiate in Toronto, and later trained as an opera singer, making her operatic debut in 1970. On this latest recording, she applies her highly-perfected soprano voice to the works of John Lennon, Mick Jagger, Dan Fogelberg, Harry Nilsson, Joni Mitchell and Jim Croce.

Within 12 hours of the CD's launch, more than 100 people downloaded the file from the Internet. Those interested can order the CD by phoning 1-800-Joe-Radio.

Study of Anti-Semitism on TVO: The Longest Hatred, a three-part British series that explore the historic roots of anti-Semitism, is scheduled for broadcast on TVOntario on July 23 at 10 a.m.

The first part, From the Cross to the Swastika, asks the questions, "How did the cross get twisted into a swastika?" and "Was the Holocaust the inevitable outcome of 2,000 years of Christianity?" Issues discussed include the horrors of the crusades, the massacre of Jews at the time of Richard the Lionheart, the church-sanctioned stoning of Jews, and Jewish suffering during the Spanish Inquisition.

The second part, Enemies of the People, looks at the frightening resurgence of anti-Semitism in Central and Eastern Europe. Part 3, Between Moses and Mohammed, examines the revival of Islam and the Arab-Israeli conflict, and the growth of anti-Semitism and racism in the Middle East.

At the Koffler Gallery: Minyan, a new indoor-outdoor sculpture by London, Ont., artist Cyril Reade, constitutes a memorial to the decline of tradition in the community and a personal reflection on the Holocaust. The work consists of 10 abstracted chairs, representing a minyan, and 10 columns of dinner plates stacked on a marble slab. A video playing in the next room shows the continuous smashing of plates. Outside are 10 more chairs.

A new work by Michael Buckland called 6,614,241 reasons to smile, is also on view. Koffler Gallery, 4588 Bathurst St., North York. Until August 4.

In Brief: The National Ballet of Canada performs at the Barry Zukerman Amphitheatre in Earl Bales Park, August 19 at 8 p.m. For ticket information, call 392-3846.

CJN Brings Together Jazz Duo: Toronto-area singer Renee Malamed and pianist Richard Fruchtman met through an advertisement for musical accompaniment that Renee placed in The Canadian Jewish News about a year ago. The two have formed a jazz duo that performs at cocktail parties and clubs, including the Uptown Senator, where they played recently.

Malamed, who is from South Africa, says that the duo performs many jazz standards from the 1940s and 1950s by such composers as George Gershwin, Cole Porter and Sammy Kahn.

"We are two strangers whose love of jazz standards brought them together," she said.

Richard & Renee, as the duo is known, are available for private bookings. Phone 416-638-6602.

Gateway to the Baltics: Finland — part of the Russian Czarist Empire from 1809 to 1917, and controlled by Sweden for 700 years before that — is a younger country than Canada. Its capital, Helsinki, was built as an easterly outpost of the Swedish empire, and later became a western outpost of Russia; both countries recognized the region's military importance to the protection of their respective domains.

Today Helsinki, capital of an independent Finland, is a tidy city with about 500,000 people and much grand and impressive architecture. Situated along Finland's southern coast, at about the same latitude as Whitehorse, Helsinki's distinct Russian look has attracted numerous Hollywood directors shooting films supposedly set in Russia (Reds, White Nights, Gorky Park), in the same way that Toronto is often used cinematically to represent a generic American city.

The stately Senate Square, for example, is dominated by a late-19th-century statue of Czar Alexander II, standing in front of the 56 steps leading up to the landmark Helsinki Cathedral. As if to make the illusion more complete that this was Russian territory, dozens of Russian sailors piled from a tour bus on the morning we visited the square; they were soon taking photographs and rushing up the steps like the excited, happy-go-lucky teenagers that they were.

The red-bricked Uspensky is Helsinki's other major cathedral; while the former, with its weathered green dome and rows of pillars, reflects the classical style common in Western Europe, Uspensky bears the onion domes and mystical swirls of Russian churches to the east.

"In a way, the two cathedrals are a perfect symbol of Helsinki," our guide commented. "Here is where East and West converge."

Another domed building, tucked behind the SAS Radisson Hotel, is Helsinki's only synagogue, Adath Israel, built in 1909 by Jewish formersoldiers from Russia who had been stationed here and decided to stay. Upon request, visitors are shown the interior of the temple, which looks Sephardi in style, with the bimah in the middle of the floor, although it was constructed for an Ashkenazi congregation.

The country's only other synagogue is in Turku, the former capital (before 1917) and the former home of a community of ex-Russian-Jewish soldiers and their families. There are currently about 1,100 Jews in Helsinki, another 400 elsewhere in Finland.

The lively fish market by the harbor, near Uspensky, also sells produce and touristy items such as reindeer pelts, jewelry, ceramics and handmade crafts. Serious shoppers will prefer to stroll along the pleasant, tree-lined esplanade — a good spot for people-watching — and visit the several large department stores located near Mannerheimintu, the main street.

A convenient gateway to the Baltics, Helsinki has a capacious harbor which receives many large passenger ships in transit to international destinations. Like the city itself, the harbor offers more exotic possibilities than you might suppose at first, especially for Jewish heritage travellers.

The picturesque old city of Tallinn, Estonia, is only two hours away across the Gulf of Finland, and a regular ferry service transports travellers to the larger but equally picturesque city of Riga, Latvia. Ships commute frequently to the imperial Russian city of St. Petersburg, to Stockholm, and to various other port cities in Estonia, Latvia, Lithuania, Germany and Poland.

The island fortress of Suomenlinna, in Helsinki harbor, makes a memorable and inexpensive destination for a half-day excursion; take a ferry from the fish market. Preserved as a UNESCO World Heritage site, Suomenlinna is a series of six adjoining, well-treed islands that feature some old military buildings and restored barracks, bunkers and caves, a shipyard, and several small museums including a military museum displaying a Nazi tank and aircraft. There are also a few cafes where visitors may enjoy snacks and drinks in the open air.

The Finnish national airline, Finnair, offers direct, non-stop, competitively-priced service from Toronto to Helsinki, with connecting flights to major cities in Europe and Russia. Phone 416-222-0740.

Beamscope Canada Inc.

Firm distributes video games and other software

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

The story Larry Wasser tells about the first product his company distributed, a $99 sheet of Plexiglass that doubled the size of a television screen, is the stuff of company legend.

He founded Beamscope Canada Inc., now a distributor of video games, computers and software for Nintendo, IBM, Hewlett-Packard, Microsoft and dozens of lesser known companies, with the idea of bringing the TV screen magnifier called the Beamscope onto the market.

It was 1982 and Wasser hoped to make some serious money with the Beamscope as the then-new large screen TV systems were selling for $6,000 to $8,000.

"Here was an opportunity for someone to own one for $100, and I just said to myself, 'Simple economics say that the masses can't afford $6,000 to $8,000 and most people have $100. If this works lots of people are going to buy it'," he said.

The Beamscope did work, at least for the one or two people seated directly in front of the TV set. But 10 people couldn't watch the Super Bowl together, Wasser recalled, because most of them would be out of the field of vision and the picture they saw would be distorted.

This limitation prevented him from selling billions of Beamscope, he believes. "If that problem were able to have been solved, there was no limit to how many could have been sold," he said, speaking with his hands and exuding entrepreneurial zeal.

Not one to throw in the towel easily, Wasser managed to sell the Beamscope to several department store chains, but he hadn't hit pay dirt — yet.

For six months in 1982, he ran Beamscope on his own and then was joined by his partner Morey Chaplick, a friend from the days he attended Forest Hill Collegiate.

The big money eluded Wasser, now 39, and Chaplick, 38, until 1986, when they got their first break — a deal to distribute the Nintendo video game in Canada. They were lucky enough to get in on the ground floor of the craze, at a time when hardly anyone had even heard of Nintendo, and the money began rolling in.

"It was an unbelievable sales success story — 1987, 1988, 1989, were unparalleled years. I'd never seen anything like it," said Wasser. "No matter how many pieces of product we got delivered to the warehouse, they were gone the same day. It wasn't selling, it was just order taking."

They knew the Nintendo boom could not last forever, and Wasser and Chaplick set out to diversify, to make sure all their eggs were not in one basket.

Competitors like Sega Genesis and Atari eventually came into the video game market and Nintendo sales began to drop in 1990. But through Nintendo sales Beamscope had built up its network of customers, the anchor being IBM," said Wasser.

The success of the PS/1 attracted other computer companies to the small-office, home-office (SoHo) market. They had been focusing on corporate customers since the '80s and this market was saturated by the early '90s.

In 1993, opportunity knocked at Beamscope's door once again when Hewlett-Packard, a dominant player in the printer business, asked Wasser and Chaplick if they could do for them what they had done for IBM.

Larry Wasser:Founder of Beamscope Canada Inc. [Barry Shainbaum photo]

Wasser said, and the company was ready to funnel new products through the system.

In 1990, they struck a deal to distribute IBM's home computer, the PS/1. It was their second major coup. They got into the home computer business just as it was beginning to take off.

"We were able to take the IBM PS/1, which when we started was nowhere in terms of market penetration, and make it the number 1 home computer in Canada, and built up a home office products division with

"We had to say yes because it was a great opportunity," said Wasser. There was one problem, though — money. They needed an infusion of capital to enlarge their Scarborough, Ont., head office and warehouse and to hire staff to handle the dramatic increase in volume that would come with the Hewlett-Packard account.

"In November 1993 we were doing 1,300 orders a day and we were three to five days behind in shipping because we couldn't handle the volume in the critical time of year, which is Christmas," he said.

Beamscope went public on the Toronto Stock Exchange in November 1993, raising $18 million, and invested part of that in advanced computer systems, software and state-of-the-art bar coding. The company's order-taking capacity immediately tripled and they were able to ship the same day.

Issued at $7, Beamscope stock shot up to more than $13 in a year, where it hovers today. A secondary public offering in January 1995 yielded another $14 million. Sales for 1994 rose to $195 million, up 75 per cent from 1993, and profits doubled to $5.3 million.

"People look at it and think I knew this was going to happen all along, and I would like to tell you that I knew, when we were $80 million, that a year and a half later we would be $200 million, but I don't think anybody can have that kind of knowledge," said Wasser.

The SoHo market is far from saturated yet — only about 25 to 30 per cent penetrated, Wasser estimates.

"That number is going to anywhere from 50 to 80 per cent, in terms of household penetration, so there's quite a long way to grow," he said.

Beamscope opened a subsidiary in Chile and is looking for opportunities to expand internationally. They've recently made a video and CD-ROM about how to use the Internet and they intend to manufacture other products in the future, he said.

"We have the capital, we know what makes a product successful, we have a great retail channel, we've got some good supplier partners and some good customers. There's no reason why we can't keep building this thing bigger and bigger."

Wasser said building a business today, a favorite subject of his and one he has spoken on at various functions, may be a daunting task, but it can still be done.

"If you have a good business plan, idea or product and you're prepared to work hard and you believe in it, you can be successful in this country," he said.

Although Beamscope eats up much of Wasser's time, his wife Marla and their children, Justin, 6, and Derek, 4, are the centre of his world.

"My first and foremost passion is my family. That's really what I'm working so hard for is my family," he said. "You couldn't build a business to this size unless you had a terrific support mechanism in place."

Civil strife feared

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — A rabbinic ruling forbidding soldiers to evacuate army bases or settlements in the West Bank has sparked a political storm and fueled fears of a deepening split in the nation.

The halachic decision by a group of prominent rabbis including former Ashkenazi Chief Rabbi Avraham Shapira ruled that "there is a Torah prohibition against uprooting Israel Defence Forces [IDF] bases and transferring the sites to gentiles, since this contravenes a positive [Torah] commandment and also endangers life and the existence of the state ... Therefore ... any Jew is forbidden from taking part in any act that will bring about the evacuation of a settlement, a base or a [military] installation."

Last week's controversial ruling comes on the eve of the IDF's planned evacuation of several bases in the West Bank as the government prepares to implement Stage 2 of the Oslo accord, which will extend Palestinian self-rule to these areas.

The decision by the international Rabbinic Forum for Israel raises the spectre of religious soldiers resisting orders to evacuate bases and could signal the start of a civil revolt, say some observers.

Auschwitz photos mystery solved

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — "That's me," exclaimed Jennie Lipson, 86, a resident of Terrace Gardens as she looked at a photograph on the front page of the July 6 CJN.

In the picture, which accompanied a story called Auschwitz Photos a Mystery, Jennie is a young mother holding her daughter. She had sent the photograph to her parents in Poland almost 60 years ago.

A car in the background with a 1936 Ontario license plate led researchers at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington D.C. to contact The CJN. They hoped to identify the people shown in a bundle of 16 photos found in Auschwitz in January 1945 in a suitcase containing 2,426 personal photos.

The photographs had been confiscated by the Germans and held at the National Museum of Auschwitz-Birkenau, seen only by a handful of survivors and researchers. Recently, they were brought to Washington for duplication and archival cataloguing and will become part of an exhibition at the Memorial Museum there.

Saidye Bronfman: in memoriam

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Saidye Bronfman, matriarch, humanitarian, benefactor, community pioneer and patron of the arts, died at home in her sleep on July 6. She was 98.

The tributes at her funeral revealed her as an individual with a lot of spunk, not afraid to speak her mind, who as a young woman described herself as "the devil in the family."

A sense of that individual, the girl from the Manitoba village of Plum Coulee, who won the heart of the man who was building the Seagram whisky empire, and would rear one of the continent's best-known families, came through clearly.

The funeral was held in the theatre of the Saidye Bronfman Centre (SBC), the cultural institution attached to the YM-YWHA that was built by Bronfman's four children in honor of her 70th birthday.

The News In Brief Everywhere

CANADA

Clothes for Victims

MONTREAL — This city's Jewish community has collected dozens of bags of clothes for the victims of this month's massive forest fire in Israel, the country's worst ever.

At least 30 families were left homeless by the blaze.

Clothes are being collected indefinitely and may be dropped off at the Saidye Bronfman Centre.

No similar drive is taking place in Toronto.

Gay Jewish Parley

TORONTO — Canadians are preparing for the 14th International Conference of Gay and Lesbian Jews, to take place July 27 to 30 in New York City.

Seminars and social events are planned. Issues to be explored will be Jewish rituals, coming out, gay and lesbian activism and living with AIDS and HIV.

Israeli MK Yael Dayan will deliver a keynote address.

Hundreds of people from 40 countries are expected to attend.

For details, call 212-929-9498.

Order of Canada

OTTAWA — The names of two Jewish Canadians appointed recently to the Order of Canada were omitted in a July 6 CJN brief.

Named as Officers, the Order's second highest rank, were Carl Goresky of Montreal in science, and Ronald Melzack, also of Montreal, for his work in health care.

ISRAEL

Netanyahu Ahead

JERUSALEM — Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu outpolled Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin in a July 3 Gallup survey.

In the race for prime minister, Netanyahu was prefered by 44.5 per cent of respondents and Rabin by 37.1 per cent. The rest were undecided. Over 500 Israelis were polled. The margin of error is four per cent.

Peres, Netanyahu Agree

JERUSALEM — In a rare show of unity, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu both came out strongly against civil disobedience by Jewish settlers.

"Anyone who says the law must be broken does not belong in a country which abides by the rule of law," Peres said last week.

Said Netanyahu: "There's no room for rebellion [or] civil war. What [the settlers] must do, difficult as it is, is to adhere strictly to the rule of law. I recommend waging a responsible, legal, political struggle."

Water, Water ...

JERUSALEM — The Palestinians will not be allowed to divert Israel's water supplies from aquifers in the territories.

Instead the Palestinian Authority will be allowed to drill for water in the eastern part of the territories, government sources said last week.

WZO Emissary Killed

TEL AVIV — A Mexican man has confessed to last week's murder of a World Zionist Organization (WZO) emissary in Mexico City.

Jose Sanchez confessed to killing Shlomo Biran, 59, during an argument in Biran's apartment.

This is the second murder of a WZO emissary this year. In March, Shimon Feingold, 49, was killed during a fight with drunken neighbors in Kiev, Ukraine.

WORLD

Rifkind Appointment

LONDON — Parliamentary supporters of Israel have welcomed the appointment of Malcolm Rifkind as Britain's new foreign secretary.

Rifkind, who succeeds Douglas Hurd, becomes the first Jew to hold the post since Lord Rufus Daniel Isaacs, in Ramsay MacDonald's national government of 1931. Rifkind had been defence secretary for three years.

New Rabbi

BUCHAREST — The same night last month that Romania's Jewish community marked the first yahrzeit of its late Chief Rabbi Moses Rosen, a new chief rabbi for Bucharest was elected.

Eventually, Rabbi Yehezkel Mark will serve as the chief rabbi for the entire nation.

Rabbi Mark was born in 1928 in Bascesti-Roman, Romania, and illegally immigrated to Israel. He also spent many years in South Africa.

German Anti-Semitism

BONN — Anti-Semitic offenses in 1994 in Germany more than doubled over the previous year, according to an annual audit.

In 1994, authorities recorded 1,366 anti-Semitic incidents, the report said. The year before, 656 were recorded.

The rise in numbers applied to non-violent anti-Semitic activities, such as racist propaganda, insults and property damage.

By contrast, violent anti-Semitic acts dropped from 72 cases in 1993 to 41 in 1994.

Deportations Marked

BUDAPEST — Hungarian and world Jewish leaders recently commemorated the 51st anniversary of the deportations of Hungarian Jews during World War II.

No one representing the Hungarian government attended the main July 2 ceremony at the Dohany Street Synagogue in Budapest.

Tasmanian Synagogue

SYDNEY — Australia's oldest continually functioning synagogue, located on the island of Tasmania, recently marked its 150th anniversary.

A series of lectures and concerts marked the anniversary of the Hobart Synagogue in Tasmania's capital. About 250 Jews live on the island, south of Australia.

Today, the synagogue conducts Orthodox and Reform services. It opened in 1845 and still contains the "penal pews" for convicts who were banished to Australia.

The Lowest Burial Cost Available from Any Jewish Establishment

When economy is a major consideration, you should know that Hebrew Basic Burial offers the lowest interment costs available from any Jewish establishment. Keeping burial costs low is in no way a negative reflection on either the family or the departed. Families who have used Hebrew Basic Burial's services have all found that dignity and observance of Jewish law were exactly as they should be.

Low cost is just one of many factors which may be involved in arranging a burial that meets a family's emotional and spiritual needs. We welcome inquiries from people who would like to know more about the option of a basic Jewish graveside service and the savings that go with it.

Reward offered for information on vandalism

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

This is a portion of the flyer prepared by Canadian Jewish Congress and distributed to 2,400 households in the area around the Shaarei Tzedec Synagogue.

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress is taking a novel approach in a bid to uncover the vandals who spray-painted two swastikas on the front doors of a downtown Toronto synagogue.

Congress has asked Canada Post to circulate a one-page flyer that offers a $5,000 reward for information leading to the arrest and conviction of those responsible for desecrating the Shaarei Tzedec Synagogue, located at Markham and Ulster in the city's Annex neighborhood.

The flyer will reach an estimated 2,400 homes in a two-kilomtere radius around the shul, said Moshe Ronen, chair of Congress' Ontario region.

It enlarges on Congress' past practice of offering rewards for information about such hate crimes, Ronen said. The innovation this time is to pay to have the flyer delivered in the mail in the area around the synagogue.

In 1989, a $5,000 reward led to the arrest and conviction of Zvonimir Lelas for desecrating the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue. Lelas eventually received a one-year jail sentence.

The Shaarei Tzedec desecration took place on July 7, between 8:30 and 11:30 p.m., said Leondar Shushan, a regular attendee at the shul. He said people in the synagogue at the time were unaware of the vandalism.

Jeffrey Phillips, acting sexton of the synagogue, said members reacted with "disgust and shock. At the same time, they were not that surprised. We know what kind of neighborhood we're in. There are lots of skinheads in the area."

(About one year ago, a massive street brawl involving anti-racists and members of the white supremacist Heritage Front broke out around College and Bathurst, about one kilometre from the shul.)

Phillips said police responded quickly when informed of the vandalism and appeared to be "extremely concerned. They took it very seriously."

Toronto Mayor Barbara Hall condemned the desecration, saying "all residents of Toronto should be angered and hurt by this. It is aimed at instilling fear in the Jewish community. History has shown us that Nazis and people who hate disrespect the rights of all groups. Their hatred and activities are a threat to us all."

Ronen said "distribution of the reward flyer is another step in demonstrating our committment to protecting our community."

Congress is also discussing security precautions with other synagogues, such as installing outdoor lighting, which seems to deter such incidents, he said.

Ronen said that if an arrest is made, Congress would press Attorney General Charles Harnick "to deal with it in the strictest way possible." Congress will urge Harnick to seek an enhanced sentence because it is a hate-motivated crime.

The Shaarei Tzedec is one of Toronto's oldest synagogues, tracing its roots back 100 years. Originally located on Centre Avenue, near Dundas and University, it moved to its current location in 1937, said Dr. Joe Greenberg, president of the shul.

"It's unique. It has a sense of sweetness and generosity ... Everyone is totally welcome ... It's really a little jewel in a quiet community. It's a house of peace, a contrast to the message of hate painted on the doors," he said.

Shul marks 75th anniversary

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — "The moment I stepped inside I felt as if I were back in my zayde's little shul on Augusta Avenue," Dr. Jack Gryfe of the Toronto Historical Board said at the 75th anniversary rededication of the Beach Hebrew Institute.

The shul on Kenilworth Avenue near Kew Beach was designated a historical building in 1982.

It was founded in an area remote from the mainstream Jewish community to meet the needs of local business people and their families, as well as of cottagers who summered near the lake.

The neighborhood environment was not always comfortable. Ed Brickman, whose father operated Globe Cleaning on Queen Street, recalls the '30s, when young louts with swastika armbands strutted the sidewalks or "hung out" at a certain cigar store.

But the congregation carried on and Brickman's mother collected $500 for the shul, with money left over to paint the interior. In the '80s he says, she raised $15,000 for a Torah scroll.

There have been challenges — a decreasing congregation, financial problems, even a flood, but Sam Tanenbaum, who with shul president Arie Nerman, conducts regular services, notes, "In every generation someone is here."

On the day of the rededication service and Torah walk, the synagogue was alive with members and friends. As the procession wound down Kenilworth Avenue toward the lakefront — men, women and children singing the joyous Siman Tov u'Mazal Tov — residents emerged from their houses. They didn't stare or appear indifferent but seemed somehow to be in harmony; a few men tipped their caps.

Toronto Mayor Barbara Hall said a film crew who had been recording the proceedings planned use this segment as a happy conclusion to a documentary on the infamous Christie Pits Riots.

As he outlined the evolution of the Beach Hebrew Institute, Nerman said, "We are here and we are here to stay!"

Judith Dan remembered for concern for others

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

Judith Dan

TORONTO — Judith Dan, wife of noted philanthropist Leslie Dan, chair and CEO of Novopharm, died July 7 of a massive heart attack. She was 61.

An artist of some note, Dan's work hangs at Temple Emanu-El and in the Novopharm offices.

Born in Stonewall, Manitoba, she graduated from the University of Manitoba in Winnipeg as an interior designer.

Diagnosed with juvenile diabetes at the age of 18, she lived an active and creative life in spite of her increasing physical frailty.

At her funeral, Dan was praised for her modesty, optimism, determination, tolerance and concern for others, rich or poor.

Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld recalled that she was "always creating, studying, writing poetry or taking art courses."

He noted that she shared her husband Leslie's "passion for tzedakah. She was always there suggesting, encouraging, rejoicing in the mitzvah of giving."

In a story which is already becoming almost legendary, Rabbi Ephraim Shore of Aish HaTorah told The CJN that Dan refused to allow them to cancel the formal opening celebrations for the new Aish HaTorah world centre in Jerusalem last fall, even though she was in a wheelchair because of a broken hip.

When she could not navigate all the steps, a construction crane swooped down, picked her up, wheelchair and all, and deposited her in a place of honor.

She and her husband studied together regularly, Rabbi Shore said. "She was a great lady — a kind, gentle woman."

One of Dan's interests in her last few years was She'arim Hebrew Day School. Taking a tour of the school before the couple were honored at an annual brunch, she was captivated by some students working in the arts integration program.

Judy Spetter, head of that program, said, "She just sat down and started working with the kids, doing telephone wire sculpture."

She donated weaving and other materials for the arts program and "saw how the arts play a role in healing and growth — especially in a school."

Worldly goods and material possessions didn't impress her, Spetter said. Sincerity and simplicity did.

Dan was in the process of setting to music a book of poems she had written and distributed to selected friends.

Besides Leslie, her husband of 37 years, she is survived by children Michael and Camille, Aubrey and Marla, and Andrea and Stuart Hytman; brother and sister-in-law Paul and Nell Henteleff and six grandchildren.

Dr. Gregg Stern

TORONTO — Dr. Gregg Stern, an historian of Jewish culture, has been appointed the Ray D. Wolfe Fellow at the University of Toronto for the academic year 1995-6.

Stern's research focuses on the intellectual and spiritual life of medieval southern French Jewry — a community that flourished from the 12th to the 14th centuries and possessed a distinct and independent self-image. Documents indicating a high level of literacy in that community have only come to light quite recently.

Stern received his PhD from Harvard in 1995 and is currently a Fulbright Research Fellow in the Department of Talmud at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

He is working on a book about southern French Jewish culture before a decisive, although temporary expulsion in 1306, and about the representative role within it of the community's greatest halachist, Rav Menachem ha-Meiri of Perpignan.

At the University of Toronto, Stern will teach a course on the Jews of Medieval Spain and give a seminar on the Controversy over Philosophic Study in Languedoc at the turn of the 13th century.

He comes to Toronto with his wife, Naava Frank, a student of adolescent development and Jewish identity.

Ashkenaz, a celebration

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Ashkenaz was an event like no other in Toronto's history.

Harbourfront rocked to the sounds of Klezmer music and thousands of people poured into the park by the lake to celebrate.

"This is an incredible Yiddish culture which is being reborn," said artistic director David Buchbinder, the musician whose vision Ashkenaz became, at a standing-room only opening gala.

The next days bore out the reality that young and old musicians, singers, dancers, actors and storytellers have found inspiration in the Eastern European Yiddish culture. Skeptics needed only to see the throngs of young people clapping their hands and tapping their feet to music which Buchbinder described as "ecstatic communion between people."

A dozen or more klezmer bands from Europe, the United States and Canada, bearing instruments never seen here before, demonstrated that they can improvise like mad on this traditional Yiddish music. Leading the way was saxaphonist John Zorn, the New York jazz virtuoso, whose two public concerts at the Du Maurier Theatre were sell-outs.

"We're celebrating the failure of the Nazis to destroy our culture and Ashkenaz is tangible proof that we need not fear celebrating our culture in public," Ontario Deputy Solicitor General Elaine Todres told the gala.

How right she was! Despite some overcast skies and a little rain, thousands made their way from one performing space to another to see and hear 140 artists. The compact Harbourfront site was perfect, for it allowed the audience to flow back and forth, stopping here and there for refreshments and to shmooze. Oy a michiyeh!

"Ashkenaz could not have happened without Harbourfront," said Buchbinder.

I could not possibly attend all the events and at the risk of overlooking the favorite artists of other Ashkenaz fanatics, this reviewer found the lyrics and style of vocalist Michael Alpert and his New York-based Brave Old World klezmer group a satisfying blend of new and old Yiddish culture. Their song, When the Czar eats potatoes evoked the humor that flourishes among Jews in the midst of oppression.

Theatre artist Sara Felder of San Francisco, a comedian, juggler and storyteller ("When I juggle the torches don't go out for eight days"), appealed for a different reason. She sang and spoke openly as a lesbian. With a globe spinning delicately up and down her arms, she told how she broke the news of her marriage to her family: "The bad news is that my partner has no greater income potential than mine, and the good news is that she's Jewish."

The towering talent of singer Adrienne Cooper, who has appeared in Toronto before, was discusssed where Ashkenazics gathered to talk. Her recital at Molson Place was a triumph.

For those 250 or so lucky enough to find seats in the Studio Theatre for its one performance, the 19-member Yiddish Theatre troupe from Montreal's Saidye Bronfman Centre was the highlight of the week. Director Dora Wasserman is a genius at mining the broad immigrant humor of our parents. If only she had a twin with as much talent to satisfy the deep yearning in Toronto for such fare on a regular basis.

Congratulations to Buchbinder and his team of Bruce Rosensweet, Judith Cardozo and Dianne Weinrib, and their magnificent support staff.

Toronto briefed on Davar bailout

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Davar, the first daily of the Labor Zionist movement, has been given a new lease on life.

Threatened by bankruptcy, Davar has been rescued by the Histadrut labor federation, says its executive editor, Daniel Bloch.

The aid package, valued at millions of dollars, comes at a high price — the sacking of more than half its staff.

Published in Tel Aviv, Davar was founded in 1925, making it the second-oldest daily in Israel after Ha'aretz (1919). Two of its editors, Zalman Rubashov (Shazar) and Moshe Shertok (Sharett), went on to serve as president and prime minister of Israel, respectively.

Until the late 1950s, Davar was one of Israel's leading newspapers, with a daily circulation of 50,000. But as readers tired of a daily inextricably connected with the Labor party, readership declined to 10,000 and the paper reported annual losses of $3 to $4 million (US) in recent years.

As a result of the red ink, rumors surfaced that Davar would close.

Under the recently announced rescue plan, Davar will shut its existing printing plant and use the presses of Al-Hamishmar, the left-wing daily which floundered earlier this year.

In addition, the Histadrut will cover Davar's past debts of about $2.5 million and come up with a $4-million severance package for 90 laid-off workers. Eventually, the staff will be reduced to 80 employees from a high of 300 some years ago.

Finally, the Histadrut will pump $4 million into Davar over the next four years and ultimately sever its official links with the publication, said Bloch, who was in Toronto to brief Canadian labor leaders on the Middle East peace process. His trip was sponsored by the Israeli Foreign Ministry.

In the future, management hopes that the ownership of Davar will be evenly divided between workers and private investors, and that the circulation can be raised to 25,000.

Bloch, the former president of the National Federation of Israeli Journalists, is not certain whether the assistance package will render Davar solvent.

In his view, the quality of journalism in Israel has declined because editors today are more interested in sensation.

In general, Bloch opposes censorship. "But as we move from a state of war to peace, there is less need for it."

The liberal editorial line will remain the same. Davar will continue to support the government's thrust toward peace and its economic and social policies.

Bloch believes that most foreign correspondents based in Israel are "quite fair, though you'll find some anti-Israel reporters."

It is too early to write off the Labor party's chances of winning reelection in 1996. As he put it: "A lot will depend on the peace process and the internal security situation."

Mikvah opened by Reform in Thornhill

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The newly opened Reform mikvah in Thornhill requires 200 ten-pound blocks of ice, providing the mayim chayim (natural waters) to observe halachic standards.

A Mississauga ice company made a production line change so that the 200 blocks came off unbagged, so no wrapping would make the melted water unpure, Rabbi Daniel Komito-Gottlieb said recently at the dedication of the Thornhill Community Mikvah at the Canadian Centre for Reform Judaism on Atkinson Avenue in the Bathurst-Clark area.

The small holding tank for the melted ice water, the cistern where the natural water and tap water are mixed, and the spanking new mikvah with its broad, walk-in stairs and four-and- one-half foot depth were shown to guests by Rabbi Gottlieb, its designer. He explained that the water from the cistern "kisses" the mikvah water via a pipe, as required.

He presented a hand-written certificate from Orthodox Rabbi Charles Rosensweig of Detroit, attesting to its halachic standards, to Jeffrey Dermer, Toronto Reform Council president.

Three cloth-covered baffles in the room adjoining the mikvah are a special feature protecting a woman's privacy while the male rabbi can hear the sound of a woman's immersion and her recital of the required bracha in a conversion.

Though 50-60 women converting to Judaism used the mikvah recently in a 10-day period at the end of special courses in Reform temples, at the moment it is used regularly by only two to three people a week, Rabbi Gottlieb said. However, he expects the number of mikvah users will grow quickly. Opened in March, its clients have included people from Winnipeg, central Ontario and Eastern Canada.

The Reform community in greater Toronto must have its own mikvah, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein told the dedication guests, describing her own "spiritual transformation" following immersion before her ordination and before her marriage.

The need for a mikvah became crucial when one formerly used for Reform conversions on Sheppard Avenue was no longer available for that purpose, "for political reasons," she said. A commmunity mikvah in the Terrace nursing home at Bathurst-Wilson is open to Conservative, Reconstructionist and Reform adherents, but the new mikvah in Thornhill is also needed, because of its location.

Besides its importance for conversions, the mikvah can be used for other purposes as well, such as by brides and grooms and by men to deal with their emotional crises, she said.

Annual membership fees are $100 ($50 for students), while one-time users are asked to make a donation or pay a fee in increments of $18, according to Brenda Saunders, the mikvah supervisor.

A manual is sent out detailing the preparation for immersion. A woman must wear no makeup, jewelry or nail polish, Saunders said.

Though located in Thornhill, it is open to the whole community. (For information, 905-709-1898.)

Agency funding constant

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — With some exceptions, United Way dollars destined for Jewish agencies in Metro Toronto this year will remain more or less the same as in 1994.

This year's funding formula for Jewish organizations provides more evidence that the ravages of the recession have not quite healed. Before the economy turned sour, Jewish agencies received yearly increases from the United Way of between five and 10 per cent.

The United Way will distribute $41.8 million to over 250 charities this year, based on a record-breaking 1994 campaign of $49 million, it announced late last month.

Eleven Jewish agencies will split $3 million in United Way funding for 1995, up just slightly from a year ago.

- The third largest recipient of United Way dollars — Jewish Family and Child Service — will receive just over $1.34 million, the same amount as last year.
- Jewish Vocational Services (JVS) will get $40,000 more than last year, putting its allocation at $437,916. The extra money is a one-time grant to help JVS develop special computer software to help retrain clients.
- The Baycrest Centre will get $370,079, down $10,000 from a year ago and the third decrease in as many years. Baycrest is in for two more $10,000 cuts over the next two years because it agreed to a reduction in funding over five years in order to help other agencies. But according to spokesperson Jennifer Schipper, the centre hasn't been hurt by the cuts because the United Way allows donors to target contributions specifically to Baycrest.
- The Bathurst Jewish Centre will receive $369,696 this year. Together with the allocation to the Bloor Jewish Community Centre — $92,424 — the figure is the same as the grant last year and the year before to the now-defunct Jewish Community Centre.
- The Bernard Betel Centre will get the same amount as last year, $143,080.
- The allocation to Senior Care, which recently announced plans to merge with Baycrest, is unchanged at $108,981.
- An increase of $6,000 will go to Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa, putting its total grant at just over $50,000.
- The social planning committee at Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto will receive $45,701, the same amount as in 1994 but half of what it got three years ago.
- Bikur Cholim will receive a one-time renewable grant of $22,000, up from last year's $19,000. The volunteer organization is not a United Way member agency but receives annual grants.
- The Jewish Camp Council's allocation this year will be $18,168, the same as last year.

Christian group targets Jewish kids for conversion

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Christian organization's recent call to target Jewish children for conversion is "shocking" and "disgusting," charges Jews for Judaism, the counter-missionary group.

Jews for Judaism says Chosen People Ministries (CPM), a so-called Hebrew-Christian group that operates in six countries, is trying to lure Jewish children to evangelical Christianity.

A recent CPM newsletter mailed to Canadian supporters makes no bones about evangelizing to "impressionable" Jewish children in order to persuade them to accept Jesus as messiah, says Jews for Judaism director Julius Ciss.

The newsletter urges supporters to "reach Jewish boys and girls" through Shabbat "schools" (sic); neighborhood Bible clubs, summer camps, evangelical literature, training youth workers in the former Soviet republics and bar and bat mitzvahs.

"Reach Jewish Children for Jesus," it exhorts. "Often, it is easier for Jewish people to accept the truth about our Messiah while they're young than at any other time in their lives. In fact, 85 per cent of believers accept Christ before the age of 18.

"Today, young Jewish people are searching for answers as never before. They're open to the Good News of the Messiah, if only we can deliver it to them in a way they will hear and understand," the mailing states.

Targeting Jewish kids for conversion is "unethical and utterly contemptible," an angry Ciss told The CJN.

"Children are often incapable of appreciating the issues involved. They're also highly suggestible and trusting. That sets the stage for flagrant abuse."

The latest salvo, he adds, shatters the myth that evangelical Christian groups proselytize adults only.

Larry Rich, Canadian director of CPM, told The CJN that it's not his organization's policy to target Jewish children without their parents' consent.

"We include the whole family. We don't want to appear to be evangelizing to children without the support of the whole family."

But, he added, "children need a new life in the messiah, Yeshua (Jesus). Our purpose is to share with Jewish people and others the message of the messiah."

It's CPM's written policy, Rich noted, "not to permit children under 18 to come [to services or programs] without parental permission."

According to Ciss, CPM is the second largest Christian missionary organization operating in Canada (after Jews for Jesus), with a global budget of over $7 million.

The flip side of the coin is reported in the summer issue of B'nai B'rith International's Jewish Monthly. In an article entitled Praying on the Elderly, the magazine describes aggressive and often successful new efforts by messianic groups in Florida to attract older Jews to Jesus.

Play angers Markham Jewish residents

MARKHAM — Some Jewish residents of this Toronto suburb are still steaming over what they say was a misleading play staged by a Christian group.

Flyers advertising Toymaker & Son were posted last month around the Bayview Avenue and John Street area, which has a sizeable Jewish population.

The play was touted as "an epic story of the most powerful rebellion in history ... The greatest love story in the universe and the most daring rescue plan ever conceived." It was hosted by the Thornhill Vineyard and staged four times in Markham parks late last month and on July 1.

But the posters did not say the Thornhill Vineyard is a branch of The Vineyard, a Pentecostal Christian movement founded in 1974, whose followers have been known to whoop, laugh, bark and bray while entranced in prayer.

Those who attended quickly discovered the story was an allegory for the death and resurrection of Jesus.

"At first I had a mild burn. Then I got more and more angry," Braeburn Drive resident Neil Morris told The CJN. "I left as soon as I realized what it was about. It was so deceitful."

Morris, who attended a June 23 showing of the play in Windy Hill Park, said most of the audience of about 50 were children, attracted by the play's title. He said many of his Jewish neighbors are upset too.

The Thornhill Vineyard's pastor, Dale Bolton, was unavailable for comment last week. — R.C.

The article "Jewish high school to open in Ottawa" (CJN June 29), should have explained that although this will be the first co-ed Jewish high school, the city does offer secondary education at three yeshivot: Ottawa Torah Institute for boys, Mahon Sarah for girls and Mesiftah Chabad, a Lubavitch school for boys.

The CJN regrets that the article may have left the impression that Ottawa had no high schools for Jewish students.

What to jettison

At the gathering last month in Jerusalem of the World Zionist Organization, Jewish Agency chair Avraham Burg unveiled a forward-looking program of intercommunal development for Jews in Israel and in the Diaspora entitled Brit Am. Included in the program were ideas for the improvement of the educational system in Israel.

In particular, Burg suggested that the Israeli school curriculum contain the study of Judaism, its historical development, its holidays, the prayer book and classic Jewish texts, foremost among them but not exclusively, the Mishna and the Gemara. He reasoned that only a curriculum which teaches, to some extent at least, a sense of Jewishness, can staunch the increasing flow of Israeli youth away from the values and traditions of their forebears.

Veteran Israeli commentator Yosef Goell reacted angrily to Burg's suggestions. Writing in the Jerusalem Post (July 4), Goell termed Burg's ideas "nothing less than off the wall." He rejected them entirely. Goell did concede that there are many signs of spiritual crisis among Israeli youth but denied that the crisis had anything to do with a sense of alienation from the Jewish people or from being Jewish. He did not, however, suggest alternate reasons for their alienation. Instead, with a clear, unambiguous wave of his hand, he dismissed Judaism as "an ancient civilization" whose values contain some "treasured nuggets but [are] also chock-full of irrelevant, alte shmattes ... Seeking to apply the values of such an ancient civilization to the needs of modern Jewish society requires a large measure of selectivity. Much should be jettisoned."

It is wholly inappropriate for Diaspora dwellers to prescribe formulae for the education of Israelis in Israel. We do not presume to do so. But no less is it inappropriate for Goell to prescribe the dispatch of "much" of the values of "an ancient civilization." That he does, so cavalierly, is evidence of the very alienation of which Burg spoke. It is an alienation of a growing segment of a people from its religion, traditions and heritage. More ominously, it is also evidence of an alienation of a growing segment of a people from many of their fellow Jews.

If anything is to be jettisoned it should be inflexible, intolerant, inhospitable attitudes — the attitudes of those individuals who neither understand nor care to understand the beauty and the importance of being Jewish, as well as of those individuals whose behavior has helped lead the former to a view of Judaism as nothing more than an ancient civilization.

More than a veneer

As of this writing, the Serbian forces from Bosnia are poised to overtake the city of Zepa, declared by the UN to be a "safe haven" for its Muslim population. Having already captured the safe haven of Srebrenica, they seem to be on an inexorable march of killing, pillage and expulsion.

Scores of thousands of human beings, almost all Bosnian Muslims, have been driven from their homes. Families have been divided. Men have been taken away. Up to 20,000 people are reported missing. Reports of rape and killing by the advancing Serbian army fill the airwaves and the pages of communiques.

In the summertime of 1995, 50 years after World War II, 47 years after the passage of the International Declaration of Human Rights, and less than five years before the change in millennium, the reports and the scenes of such deliberate victimization and humiliation of fellow human beings seem hardly possible.

Though the march seems inexorable to the Bosnian Serbs, it need be neither inexorable nor irreversible.

In this 50th year since the founding of the UN, Canada must urge its fellow western nations and the full UN membership to uphold international law and order by resisting the murderous bullying by the Bosnian Serbs.

International law is civilization's instrument. And civilization must be more than a thin veneer, a mere patina of decency which falls aside at the first opportunity to settle old scores.

Hecht says CJC Plenary caused schism

I read a statement in The CJN of June 29 wherein the president of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) is quoted as having said, when referring to the bylaws of Congress: "... an honor system ... They were never abused before." The president of Congress obviously would not accuse herself of having abused the system and therefore, by direct inference, has accused me and/or my associates of such abuse.

This accusation, together with earlier attempts at character assassination promoted in the media, were and are indeed reprehensible and condemnable. They contribute to the deep schism and malaise in the community created by the CJC Plenary, of which the present president of Congress was the chair until the very last day when nomination papers had to be filed.

To further quote the president: "I think we have to go forward," therefore, without looking at the past. Such a statement would indeed exonerate those whose very comportment is being put into question by large numbers of leaders and others in the Montreal and Canadian Jewish community.

Sen. E. Leo Kolber could not be processed to vote; Prof. Irwin Cotler, a former president of CJC, had to wait six hours to be accredited; and Eva Chaith, a 90-year-old grande dame of Canadian Jewry, waited for four hours and paid her delegate fee twice to be accredited. Scores of further examples of similar events have caused key community leaders to conclude that it was an organized pattern to disenfranchise certain voters and organizations.

I believe it would be appropriate if the respected Judge Herbert Marx indeed took into account the depositions of significant numbers of leaders and community members-at-large in the investigation not only of the by-laws of Congress, but of the processes which led to this year's CJC Plenary. It would not be inappropriate to request and to suggest that Judge Marx's mandate be determined by Jewish communal institutions who are independent of Congress, since it would indeed be a grave error of prudence and judgment if Congress were permitted to establish terms of reference in an investigation of itself.

Objects to reference to Christian groups

In her column (June 22, 1995), which ironically is supposed to be against hate literature, Jean Gerber states "that we no longer pander to right-wing Christian groups who appear to support Israel."

This is outrageous.

Could you imagine our reaction to a newspaper that wrote "that we no longer pander to left-wing Jewish groups who appear to support Canada."

Ms. Gerber is slandering a moral, decent group of people who have never harmed anyone. Their love of humanity, including Israel and the Jewish people, is based on their belief in the bible.

More on Buber

Re your editorial, June 15 on Martin Buber.

Though born in Vienna, then the capital of the Hapsburg Empire with Kaiser Franz Joseph at its helm, Buber's early childhood and youth were spent in Brody Galicia, with grandfather, Shlomo. Thus the road to Berlin was a circuitous one and spiritually and intellectually a very important one as to who he was to become subsequently. That ambiance shaped and imbued him.

Galicia under Austrian rule was the most liberally governed province in Poland. Under Governor Franz Stadion, slavery was abolished in 1848, earlier than in the United States and Russia (1861). The Shtetl of Brody after 1779 had flourishing private Jewish banking. It was connected by rail to Lemberg (Lvov), the Capital of Galicia, and to Berlin and Vienna.

The impulses of the Haskalah generated by Moses Mendelsohn found fertile ground in Nachman Krochmal. Born in Brody, Krochmal is considered the prince of Galician Haskalah, and in 1851 Leopold Zunz posthumously published Krochmal's lifetime intellectual oeuvre, Guide to the Perplexed of the Time. It is considered a worthy successor to the Maimonides model.

Vatican should defrock Polish priest

No amount of education nor anti-hate laws will ever rid the world of all anti-Semitism, but it should be a given that in 1995, you would not hear from a man of the cloth the poisonous venom uttered by Polish Roman Catholic priest Henryk Jankowski.

The statement by Polish President Lech Walesa stating that all symptoms of anti-Semitism both in Poland and anywhere else in the world should be universally condemned is too little and too late. Political considerations aside, it is a sad reflection on the Polish electorate that it would be offended by having the president denounce Father Jankowski's words that Jews have a satanic greed which is responsible for communism in World War II, and that the Star of David is associated with the symbols of the swastika as well as the hammer and sickle.

The apology by the Commission on Catholic and Jewish Dialogue of the Polish Episcopate is mere tokenism. The Vatican should immediately defrock Father Jankowski and the Pope should issue an unqualified condemnation.

JVS found the right person

I have just completed the pleasant experience of working with a Jewish agency in a search for part-time help. We needed a holiday fill-in, and I went to Jewish Vocational Service for help. The response was prompt and efficient.

A selection of curriculum vitae was faxed to me within 24 hours and the candidates were all highly-qualified. This is a time when many young people, with good education and often with valuable experience, are on the job market.

I would strongly recommend that employers try their local JVS. There is no charge for the service and it is excellent.

The Law of Return

By LIBBY GARSHOWITZ

Recent proposals by leading Israeli public figures from all shades of the political and religious spectrum to amend or abolish the Law of Return, have prompted this response.

As a native Torontonian who was privileged to be alive when the State of Israel was created in 1948 and as one who has witnessed many times the miracles wrought by olim in the building of the state, permit me to voice some personal thoughts regarding this law and its implications and its threatened revision.

The Law of Return, formulated on July 5, 1950, the anniversary of Theodore Herzl's death, was one of the most significant pieces of legislation enacted by the Knesset. It declared that every Jew has the right to settle in Israel as an oleh, "an immigrant to Israel for the purpose of settlement." It confirmed the eternal yearning of Jews everywhere to return to Zion, abolished all restrictions on Jewish immigration and retroactively validated the immgration of every Jew who had at any time entered the country — even in contravention of British Mandatory regulations. In effect, it conferred immediate citizenship on every Jew after a two-millenium exile and absence of Jewish sovereignty in the land of Israel. In the words of Israel's first prime minister David Ben Gurion:

> "This law lays down not that the State accords the right of settlement to Jews abroad but that this right is inherent in every Jew by virtue of his being a Jew if it but be his will to take part in settling the land. This right preceded the State of Israel; it is that which built the state."

Different challenges to the Law of Return through the years led to an amendment in 1970 which grants immigration rights and immediate citizenship to any person with a single grandparent who was Jewish, even if the connection to Judaism ended there. The Law of Return does not grant citizenship to a person who was a Jew and voluntarily changed his religion, nor to one with a criminal past who would be a danger to the public welfare.

The Law of Return also provides a definition of a Jew: a person who is born to a Jewish mother or who has been converted to Judaism and is not a member of another faith.

The ramifications of the Law of Return for the State of Israel were far-reaching and immeasurable. The end of World War II brought many survivors of world Jewry's most tragic epoch. Broken in body and spirit, they were once again threatened with imprisonment and detention as illegal immigrants. With the proclamation of the State of Israel, they faced yet another war for their own physical survival and that of the new state, as they were threatened with annihilation by adjacent Arab armies. Nevertheless, with victory, the survivors began the long healing process, rebuilding both themselves and the land. They brought culture, knowhow, pizzazz and a new dynamic to the Middle East. The State of Israel became a source of pride to Diaspora Jewry.

There began one of the finest periods in the history of the Jewish people, despite wars, hardship and culture shock. The biblical concepts of shevut (repatriation to the land of Israel) and kibbutz galuyot (the ingathering of the exiles from the four corners of the globe) were affirmed. The predictions of the Deuteronomist and the prophet Jeremiah, who had witnessed the exile of the Judeans from the southern kingdom of Judea in the sixth century BCE, were being realized.

And this rescue of Jews continues. From the former Yugoslavia and from war-torn Chechnya and from many other regions of world conflict, Jews are being airlifted to Israel. The continuing emigration of Russian Jews, sometimes a trickle, sometimes a flood, seems to fulfil the goals of visionary Israeli and Diaspora leaders who decades ago pledged to deliver "refuseniks" from the scourge of Communism.

The figures of Natan Scharansky, Joseph Begun and Ida Nudel, to name but a few, symbolized to world Jewry the "refuseniks' " fierce determination to make aliyah. And now Natan Scharansky, the eloquent spokesperson for all immigrants, is poised to form his own party, the party of Aliyah, in the 1996 elections.

Nor can we forget the spectacular rescue of Ethiopian Jews, who referred to themselves as Beita Yisrael (the House of Israel). Few who watched and applauded the planeloads of Ethiopian Jews landing at Ben-Gurion airport can discount the outpouring of welcome by Jews and Arabs alike.

The origins of Ethiopians are shrouded in obscurity; nevertheless in 1973, the then Sephardi chief rabbi of Israel, Ovadia Yosef, ruled that the Ethiopian Jews belonged to the tribe of Dan and must be given the same right to return to Israel as other Jews. Two years later the Knesset acknowledged that these Jews had the right to immigrate under the Law of Return.

Thus began Ethiopian Jewry's long struggle to gain recognition as Jews, with the subsequent right to make their home in Israel, where, in spite of the many difficulties facing them, they feel they are home. Their piety and their observance of Sabbath, holy days and mitzvot could not be impugned. They serve in the Israel Defence Force and their children can be heard prattling away in Hebrew. The government of Israel may have at first erred in requiring an assessment of the Jewishness of many of the Ethiopians, but it is now exercising greater caution and consideration in its handling of these new immigrants.

Excluded from the massive airlift were the Falashe Muras, Ethiopian Jews who had converted to Christianity. Under the Law of Return they were ineligible as Jews. Since many are relatives of Ethiopians now living in Israel, the State of Israel is examining their claims for family reunification.

Some prominent Israeli leaders raise fears about the issue of the "10 lost tribes," those who claim descent from the residents of the northern kingdom of Israel deported by the Assyrian invaders almost three millennia ago. These Israelis envisage the prospect of hundreds of thousands of immigrants, mainly from Third-World countries who allege that they are descendants of the "lost tribes," and as such will claim the right to immigrate to Israel under the Law of Return to better their economic status.

The contemporary debate among Israelis does not much differ from the dispute of the prominent second-century rabbis Akiva and his teacher Eliezer. The former stated that the "10 tribes" will never return to the land of Israel because of their sinful and idolatrous practices, whereas the latter, more lenient in his approach, prophesied that the eclipse of these displaced northerners would someday emerge into the light. Rabbi Eliezer's words reflect those of Jeremiah's contemporary, the prophet Ezekiel who anticipated the reunification by God of the divided kingdoms of Israel and Judea, the repatriation of their descendants and the bestowal of eternal peace.

Rabbi Akiva's intransigence regarding the return of the descendants of the "lost tribes," some of whom have reputedly been found in Persia, China, India and Ethiopia, provoked anger and criticism among his contemporaries.

Perhaps Rabbi Akiva's adamant refusal to recognize the reunion of the descendants of the 10 tribes reflected the Realpolitik of his day, much as they reflect the concerns expressed now by leading Israeli and Diaspora leaders. In Rabbi Akiva's reputed encounters with the descendants of the "lost tribes" during his extensive travels to muster support for his fight against the Romans, he may have recognized their complete estrangement from Judaism.

But Israelis should feel no real danger from imaginary Jewish descendants. The Law of Return does not entitle claimants to automatic immigration or to immediate citizenship unless they themselves are Jews or the children or grandchildren of Jews.

The apparent resentment of Israelis appears to be directed against the flood of recent immigrants from Russia who are not Jewish. Israelis' initial enthusiastic welcome is becoming somewhat cynical, a cynicism matched by the immigrants themselves.

Israelis fear these immigrants are using Israel as a stepping stone to emigrate to the more "lucrative" North America. They have strained existing financial, social and health resources and have exploded the system, both in Israel, which depends heavily on outside funding, and in North America. As Canadians we are aware of Russian emigres seeking status because of charges of abuse in Israel due to their non-Jewish status. However, we are also aware that Russian immigrants who remain in Israel serve in the army and die in the line of duty.

Fuelling the distrust towards recent Russian immigrants is the arrival of a large criminal element in Israel involved in drugs, prostitution and murder. Israelis were singularly distressed two months ago by the particularly cruel murders of a grandmother and her grandson in an upscale Tel Aviv neighborhood. Under arrest for these murders is a relative of the two victims, a recent immigrant. A suspected motive is the settling of scores with the son and father of the murder victims still in Russia. However, criminal issues should be resolved by the police, in tandem with the minister of the Interior who is responsible for determining whether an immigrant who "endangers the public welfare" should be granted citizenship under the Law of Return.

There can be no doubt that the influx of immigrants has changed the character of the State of Israel in the almost 50 years of its existence, but so has it changed the face of every democratic country which has permitted immigrants. The economy has also changed with worldwide upswings and downturns. No country is immune. But the State of Israel appears to have fared much better than many western economies. It has the third-largest rate of economic growth and a lower unemployment rate than Canada.

No doubt this is due in a large part to the peace process, which despite its many inherent flaws and dangers, appears to be irreversible. But the anticipated prospects of peace in the Middle East and attendant widening of contacts between Israel and some of her Arab neighbors also threaten to endanger the Law of Return, should it be debated in the Knesset. Arab Knesset members have already served notice that they will broaden the issue of "return" to include not only Jews but also pre-1948 and post-1967 Arab residents. Moreover, they threaten to attempt to repeal the Law of Return and to widen the discussion to include new universal norms for the absorption of Jews, Muslims and Christians in the State of Israel.

Perhaps cooler heads will prevail when and if the Law of Return is debated in the Knesset. At that time Israeli leaders should invite responsible Diaspora leaders to put all the issues on the table.

We commend Israel's policy of rescuing Jews from danger and persecution, wherever they exist. Negative reaction to this policy would endanger Jews in distressed countries and haunt us who live in democratic countries that we might not "have done enough." The Law of Return has been one of Israel's many salutary gifts to world Jewry.

"Returning" to Israel, thousands of immigrants in 1951 passed through the receiving centre of Shaar Aliyah on the coast near Haifa where they lived in tents and gathered their bedding from heaps dumped there by truck. [LIFE]

Letters from Jerusalem

By Ehud Luckerman

I have spent over half my life in Canada, most of it in Toronto, in peace; then why did I, 12 years ago, move away from peace, to Israel? A philosopher must seek impartiality; then why do I start a column now in Jerusalem, a city in which partisanship is inevitable? The first question I can deal with at some future time. The second I must answer now.

Today's Jewish people is a remnant of catastrophe. The Diaspora would worry less about "continuity" if rabbis were still coming from Poland. Israel would have an easier time with Arabs if a million or two chalutzim had come at the start. In the most basic respect, then, for Jewish survival the slogan of some years ago is still true: "We are one."

Then why aren't we? After the catastrophe we restored a Jewish state; it was the one thing we could do, had to do, and were successful in doing. But besieged since birth, Israel is under siege still, and the besieged (or colonized or otherwise oppressed), if unable to throw off their yoke, will always fight among themselves.

So it is with us. One camp holds that if we are fair with those laying the siege, or better still more than fair, they will end it voluntarily; the other side claims that they will end it involuntarily if we are tough on them. And extremists in the two camps see the enemy, not in those who do the besieging, but in each other.

In this situation, a philosopher's place is in the middle, between the extremes, his task being both to reconcile them and to redirect the focus to where it belongs — on the siege itself and the task of ending it. If "we are one" is the basic Jewish truth still, the Jewish philosopher's task is to restore it to Jewish consciousness.

This middle has been my political stance until the Oslo accord. Since then, however, I have been pushed, little by little, in a rightward direction, until finally I have decided to write this column, at the price of leaving the ivory tower, at the risk of being plunged into partisanship. ("Ivory tower" is a bad metaphor for me, for I was never really in it.) What has led to this decision?

The Rabin government's attempt to end the siege in the Oslo way has radicalized Israeli polarization. This much, however, has happened before with Menachem Begin's attempt to end the siege in his way. But there is a big difference. The Lebanon venture was reversed. Is Olso reversible? Probably not, and this is the Rabin government's claim and its boast. There is little cause for boasting, however. What if Olso is indeed irreversible, but for vital Israeli interests catastrophic?

Oslo then has not merely polarized Israelis but effectively disenfranchised half the Israeli population. (Give or take 10 or 20 per cent. Who, in a matter of peace or war, — let alone national survival — wants to count percentages?) No wonder then, that Israelis are confused, demoralized, depressed — more so than I have ever seen them before. Too many of them feel — have reason to feel — that they have no say in the steps, irreversible steps, taken on their behalf: letters, articles, protest marches, hunger strikes, Knesset votes. Nothing, it seems, makes any difference.

Disenfranchisement would be temporary and acceptable if, through elections called for the purpose, the public could decide on Oslo. (A referendum is a poor substitute.) But the government has not made that crucial offer. Indeed, it seems bent on a fait accompli before regular elections are due, and this, in a democracy, is astounding. Are the presently disenfranchised to remain disenfranchised until all is over except for the shouting — of ecstasy or lamentation, as the case may be?

The government has had numerous chances — lesser than elections but still significant — to reach out to the disenfranchised. The most significant was handed it courtesy of the Nobel Prize committee. Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin might have told that august body that he would accept the prize, but only when there was peace; moreover, while himself voicing Israeli hopes, he might have called on the leader of the opposition to voice Israeli fears. This would have put Yasser Arafat's commitment to peace on probation, not given him a kosher stamp. It would have — I shouldn't say this, but everybody in Israel is saying it — curbed Shimon Peres' appetite for honors, not fed it. Most important of all, it would have been a show of Israeli, nay Jewish unity, much needed by a people that is a remnant still of catastrophe.

But what happened on Nobel Peace Prize night was different and felt to be different by the more than 1,000 of us assembled in Jerusalem's Renaissance Hotel. We were listening to Kaare Kristiansen, the member of the Nobel Prize committee who had resigned in protest against a peace prize for a terrorist. The applause given Kristiansen was frequent, but loudest when he confessed to being happy at not being in Oslo that night, but with us in Jerusalem.

We too were happy with him in Jerusalem, but deeply alienated from the two leading members of our own government who were, that night, in Oslo.

In rebuilding our ancient homeland, the category of galut (exile or homelessness) no longer defines Jewish existence. "Coming home" is a source of reassurance and comfort for Jews living in Israel and throughout the world. Our coming home also deeply affected the way the world, and above all, Christianity, viewed Jews and Judaism. We are no more the cursed people condemned to eternal wandering for rejecting the supersessionist claims of Christianity. Christianity can no longer use the homelessness of Jews as a confirmation of its claim to being the New Israel. The "old" Israel lives as a vital and energetic historical people.

This may be called the "good news" that is emanating from Jerusalem today. Our return home, however, not only changed the historical relationship between Israel and the world, but also had major repercussions on the relationships among members of the Jewish people.

A family that has been separated for many years and comes home to live together soon discovers that they have different understanding of what their home should be. The difficulty of reaching agreement and harmony in the private home is magnified manyfold with respect to the home of the Jewish people.

One of the truly heroic acts of the 20th century was our proclaiming Israel as our home in spite of our knowing that there was no normative consensus about what defined the Jewish people. We proclaimed an end to our exile while we knew full well that the ingathering of our people would eventually expose deep value divisions and incompatible expectations. The heroic proclamation of the State of Israel as the home of all Jews regardless of religious and ideological differences expressed our confidence in the maturity of the Jewish people to carry on the ancient rabbinic tradition of machloket l'shem shemayim, disagreement for the sake of heaven.

The test of this national act of faith is whether the spirit of this rabbinic model of mature controversy can prevail. Can we disagree in a civilized way? Can we agree without dehumanizing and demonizing our opponents? Must a plurality of ideals and beliefs lead to sectarianism? Can different members of the family live in the same house and carry on serious conversations without threatening the very foundations of our collective existence?

I am deeply disturbed by the vicious language that has entered the public debate over the current peace process. "Rabin is a murderer, a bloody terrorist in disguise!" This language violates a fundamental feature of Jewish sensibility. It is treif. This verbal assault on the person rather than on his views must be rejected categorically by all Jews concerned with the physical and spiritual welfare of the Jewish people.

I am not calling for a blanket endorsement of the Rabin government's policies, but for learning to articulate disagreement without attacking the personal integrity of Rabin, Peres or others seeking ways to end the tragic state of war which has defined our relationship with the Arabs for the last 50 years.

There is certainly a legitimate place for disagreement in Jewish life today and I hope that all the assenting and dissenting voices will be heard. Jewish cultural and religious vitality depends on our ability to appreciate and understand how different Jews think about their history, the meaning of being a Jew and how the past claims them.

There are conflicting approaches to the meaning of the holiness of the land. While some people believe in holiness as a property that inheres in the actual land of Israel, others believe that one cannot ascribe holiness to the land if there is violence. For them, the holiness of the land is a function of the quality of life of the society that inhabits the land. They thus argue that ending war and taking a risk for peace are indigenous expressions of the primary values of Judaism.

One may take issue with the content of the argument and question the definition of holiness without challenging the legitimacy of the argument itself. After all, is it not one of the signs of the greatness of the Jewish people that we continue to argue about who is a Jew, despite 3,000 years of existence? We still cannot decide what constitutes Jewish identity. We have been reading and interpreting the Bible for 2,000 years yet we understand it in so many different ways. This diversity is not a sign of spiritual weakness — quite the contrary; it is proof that we are a people that takes learning and tradition seriously.

It is not disagreement and diversity that threaten the future of the Jewish people. It is our inability to listen to each other's arguments, to deal with the substance of the arguments without resorting to ad hominem accusations. You sharpen and intensify your own convictions when you have to confront the rigorous arguments of a serious opponent. Demonization by means of crude ad hominem accusations usually reflects a lack of confidence in one's own convictions and a fear of openly airing the reasons behind one's views. [Cont'd. on page 11]

Apology

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

Not too many people have heard of a little book that was published some 450 years ago (to be precise, in 1543). Written by Martin Luther, found ing spirit of the Protestant Reformation, the tract had a profound and malevolent impact on Christian-Jewish relations.

In his earlier years, Luther had been a staunch advocate of the need to return to the Hebrew Bible, and his path-breaking German translation was significantly influenced by his access to rabbinical sources. He criticized the Church's attitude toward the Jews, opposed the banning of the Talmud and wrote a pamphlet emphasizing that Jesus was born a Jew. In fact, because of these writings, Luther himself was accused of being a half-Jew.

Apparently he hoped to win the Jews over to his reformed Christianity, but when he failed he became increasingly disappointed with them and towards the end of his life, he published several treatises which reversed his earlier stand of cordiality and support. The particular pamphlet to which I refer was called On the Jews and Their Lies. In it he heaped upon our people a torrent of virulent abuse, called us thieves, brigands and disgusting vermin, and suggested that the secular authorities deal harshly with Jews. In his list of suggestions was the destruction of synagogues, Jewish schools and books. Jewish homes were to be razed as well, safe conduct for Jews on highways was to be revoked, their money was to be confiscated and forced labor was to be imposed. Finally, he urged, Jews should be expelled from all Christian territories. Needless to say, these suggestions — many of which became a part of German-Christian folklore — could not help but have evil consequences.

At long last, Lutheran churches have now acknowledged these sins of their founder by issuing an important apology which emphasizes that "Luther left the way wide open to those who appealed to his statements as giving his personal approval and authorization for what they were doing [and would do later]."

Some months ago a Lutheran convention made an official declaration which included this statement: "In the spirit of truth-telling we who bear his [Luther's] name and heritage must with pain acknowledge Luther's anti-Jewish diatribes and violent recommendations of his writings against the Jews. As did many of Luther's own companions in the 16th century, we reject this violent invective, and yet more do we express our deep and abiding sorrow for its tragic effects on subsequent generations.

"The Evangelical Lutheran Church is aware of the use and abuse of Luther's heritage to foster anti-Semitism, as was done in Nazi Germany and is now being done by the Nation of Islam's distribution of Luther's anti-Semitic writings."

The Lutheran statement stresses that "we recognize in anti-Semitism a contradiction and an affront to the Gospel, a violation of our hope and calling, and we pledge this Church to oppose the deadly working of such bigotry, both within our own circles and in the society around us. Finally, we pray for the continued blessing of the Blessed One upon the increasing cooperation and understanding between Lutheran Christians and the Jewish community."

Last Friday (July 14) in Winnipeg, the Evangelical Lutheran Church in Canada formally passed the resolution repudiating the anti-Semitic writings of Martin Luther.

Diaries reveal upright man who opposed Nazis

Fifty-one years ago on July 20, a time bomb exploded in Adolf Hitler's headquarters in East Prussia, killing several members of his staff but leaving him virtually unscathed.

By Sheldon Kirshner

The assassin was Claus Schenk Graf von Stauffenberg, a decorated officer who had just been appointed chief of staff to the commander of the Reserve Army.

Von Stauffenberg left the conference room minutes before the explosion, hurrying back to Berlin to coordinate a military uprising that had been carefully planned. The attempted coup, of course, failed, and von Stauffenberg and his fellow plotters were summarily executed.

Von Stauffenberg's plot — which takes on a special resonance this year on the 50th anniversary of the end of World War II — was the most serious challenge to Hitler's diabolical regime. If the conspirators — a mix of army officers, politicians, diplomats and clergy — had carried it off, the world might well have been rid of Nazi Germany nine months earlier and countless lives could have been saved.

Regrettably, the German resistance movement was small, fragmented and ineffective, and it required a crushing but costly Allied victory to smash the Nazis.

Opponents of the regime, running the gamut from communists to conservatives, labored under a great disadvantage. Until about the last two years of the war, when the tide turned against Germany, the German people more or less supported Hitler.

He had brought them a measure of prosperity and he had restored their national pride. Blinded by hubris, the majority of Germans looked the other way as Hitler established a dictatorship, institutionalized anti-Semitism and committed armed aggression against neighboring countries.

But a minority, a strong, courageous coterie of Germans who could not abide the criminal nature of his regime, turned against him.

Von Stauffenberg, a member of the Swabian aristocracy, embodied their strengths and weaknesses.

A brilliant officer who fought in Poland, France and North Africa, he had welcomed Hitler's seizure of power in 1933 as an opportunity for Germany to regain its greatness. Like his fellow officers, he was not enamored of the Weimar Republic, which emerged in the wake of World War I.

Von Stauffenberg became disillusioned with the Nazis only as their evil excesses surfaced. Prior to the war, he registered no basic objection to Hitler's anti-Jewish policy, nor did he oppose Hitler's plans to expand Germany's borders. He was a paradigm of the times.

Clearly, von Stauffenberg was not cut out of the same cloth as, say, Ludwig Beck, the army chief of staff from 1935 to 1938. Unlike von Stauffenberg, Beck was an early opponent of Hitler, strongly protesting his decision to invade Czechoslovakia in 1938. Having lost that battle, Beck resigned. Subsequently, he joined the resistance movement, and when the July 1944 assassination plot fizzled, he committed suicide.

Although military figures such as von Stauffenberg and Beck were integral to the success or failure of the machinations against Hitler, civilians played an important role too.

Karl Friedrich Goerdeler, the scion of a Prussian family and mayor of Leipzig, was thrust into the forefront of the anti-Nazi movement when a statue of the composer Felix Mendelssohn — a converted Jew — was removed by Nazi zealots. In protest, he handed in his resignation.

Goerdeler, whose own attitude to Jews was ambivalent, felt that the Nazis would not last long. He was convinced that a system sustained by "political terror, lawlessness and amorality" would collapse. That he was wrong is beside the point.

In addition to Goerdeler, and brave individuals like Hans and Sophie Scholl of the much publicized White Rose group, the most noteworthy political adversaries of the National Socialists could be found in the Kreisau circle. Composed of principled persons like Peter Graf Yorck von Wartenberg and Helmuth James Graf von Moltke, they maintained contact with trade union leaders (Julius Leber) and clergymen (Dietrich Bonhoeffer).

Perhaps the most distinguished member of the Kreisau circle was Ulrich von Hassell, whose nephew, Henning, once served as Germany's consul in Toronto.

Ulrich von Hassell, the German ambassador to Italy from 1932 to 1937, was a committed anti-Nazi.

Sophie Scholl

And if the July 1944 plot had gone off, he would have been the foreign minister of a new, democratic government. Instead, on July 28, he was arrested by the Gestapo, and executed several months later.

Fortunately, he kept a diary, and it has been published under the title of The Von Hassell Diaries (Westview Press, $24.95 US). It is a revealing cri de coeur, a heartfelt manifesto chronicling the brutalities of the Third Reich.

Von Hassell was disgusted with Kristallnacht, describing it as vile, shameless and hideous. Calling the Nazis "criminals and fools," he senses that the war is leading Germany to catastrophe.

He writes that "the war cannot be won militarily" and that the "shocking bestialities" of the SS in Poland, especially toward the Jews, have sullied Germany's name.

As the war grinds on, von Hassell is increasingly angry and bitter. As he puts it: "There is revulsion on the part of all decent people toward the shameless measures taken against the Jews ..." Then, in a prescient observation, he remarks: "There is a slowly increasing disposition on the part of the military leaders to go along no longer with this infamous and filthy business."

By 1942, he is a marked man, having been informed that he is being watched by the authorities. Yet von Hassell is not intimidated, and takes it as a compliment that Hitler dislikes him. He fulminates against the "brutal treatment" of mischlings (Germans of partial Jewish ancestry). He bemoans the fact that "the corporal" (Hitler) is "leading us into disaster."

Nothing escapes his attention. After Hans and Sophie Scholl are beheaded in 1943, he pays tribute to them. In the aftermath of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, he notes: "It is Hitler's achievement that the German has become the most loathed animal in the whole world."

Passionate, reasoned and powerful, The Von Hassell Diaries train an illuminating spotlight on an upright German. It is to Germany's everlasting shame that he and other resisters to Nazi tyranny did not succeed.

Truman, Palestine, the Press

Fifty years ago this year, Harry Truman, the former haberdasher from Independence, Missouri, succeeded Franklin Roosevelt as president of the United States. Palestine was one of his first foreign policy challenges. Would he support Jewish statehood there?

The question was inextricably connected with the increasingly bitter and divisive debate over the future of Palestine, a British mandate. The controversy preoccupied Washington just as the Cold War emerged.

Truman was basically sympathetic to Zionism and the conception of a Jewish homeland, a position that American Zionists tried to reinforce at every opportunity. But the State Department and other influential bodies in the U.S. establishment feared that the partition of Palestine between Jews and Arabs would threaten vital U.S. interests in the Middle East.

As a result of these cross-currents, Truman was subjected to intense pressure by all sides, including the media. The way in which he resolved the matter is the subject of Bruce Evensen's meticulously researched book, Truman, Palestine and the Press (Greenwood Publishing Group, $45 US).

More often than not, the battle for hearts and minds was waged in the pages of daily newspapers. American Zionists realized that if the press interpreted events in the Middle East solely in terms of Cold War tensions, they stood little chance of gaining ground. Their strategy, therefore, was to convince Truman that the United States had a vested interest in backing a Jewish state in Palestine, and that the European Jewish victims of Nazism deserved a place in the sun. In other words, the Zionists had "to create a new conventional wisdom on Palestine," Evensen observes.

Proponents of Jewish statehood labored under a disadvantage, given the State Department's insistence that the realization of Zionist ambitions in Palestine would destabilize the Mideast and enable the Soviet Union — the arch enemy — to penetrate the region.

Furthermore, the New York Times — the pre-eminent daily — opposed Zionist plans. Its assimilated Jewish publisher, Arthur Sulzberger, held that Zionism was a defeatist philosophy which was inimical to Jews in Palestine and the United States.

Truman, though basically pro-Zionist, was swayed by these arguments, and at one juncture he dropped his support for partition. Enlisting the assistance of Eddie Jacobson, Truman's old business partner and friend, the Zionists persuaded the president to see Chaim Weizmann, the venerable president of the World Zionist Organization. As events would prove, Weizmann's intercession was timely.

Jerusalem letter from Hartman

Let us not argue who is more loyal to the Jewish people or who cares more about its continuity. Instead, let us argue about the content of that continuity. Unless this spirit informs our public discourse, the moral and spiritual survival of our people will be threatened. Opening the doors to serious discussion between Orthodox, Conservative, Reconstructionist and Reform Jewish thinkers will enable people to understand what the theological and moral issues are and why there is such intense disagreement. Defamation and delegitimization of different points of view ultimately destroy interest in Torah and in the alternative paths to the spiritual renewal of our people.

Uncovering Chillul Hashem

By RABBI MARK DRATCH

There is a new ammunition in the divorce wars. It has come to light recently that Israel Goldstein, an estranged husband and father, betrothed his minor daughter to an anonymous man and threatens that he will not reveal the name of his daughter's new husband unless certain conditions are met. The problem, according to Jewish law, is that his daughter is now a married woman and cannot remarry without first receiving a get (Jewish divorce).

According to news reports, Goldstein, and perhaps some 20 others like him, have the support of a small group of rabbis and laymen which calls itself — of all things! — Shalom Bayit (domestic accord).

Torah law does allow for a father to marry off his daughter when she is a minor (i.e., under the age of 12½). The reason for this authority is to enable a father, under a different set of sociological circumstances, to assure the economic and social security of his daughter. Despite the fact that the activity is permissible according to biblical law, the Talmud states, "It is forbidden for a father to betroth his daughter while she is a minor, until she matures and says, 'I want to marry so-and-so.' " (Kiddushin 41a) This is the halachically normative position as codified by Rambam, Hilkhot Ishut 3:19 and Shulchan Aruch, Even Haezer 37:8.

It is instructive to note the comment of Rabbi Moses Isserles (Poland, 16th century) on this statement of the Shulchan Aruch: "And there are those who say that at this time there are those who do betroth their minor daughters. [The reason for this is that] we are in exile and we do not always have the funds for a dowry. In addition, we are small in number and may not always be able to find a proper match. And this is practised."

Only when it was in the daughter's best interest did Jewish law condone marriages of minors. Under our current sociological conditions, and in cases such as Goldstein's where this authority is used as a tool for extortion, for the harassment of an estranged wife and for the infliction of mental anguish upon a minor, it is villainous.

Those few individuals and rabbis who are engaged in such abhorrent and immoral behavior are engaged in Chillul Hashem, the desecration of God's Name, through their misuse and abuse of the Torah's precepts.

The Jewish legal system, like all legal systems, can be misused. Nachmanides condemns those who act according to the letter of the law while ignoring its spirit, and labels them naval bireshut HaTorah, vile scoundrels who manipulate the authority of the Torah. It is the broad charge to be holy which is seen by this great commentator as the Bible's corrective for these ignoble deeds. It is our task as responsible members of the Jewish community to stop these gross violations of decency and holiness.

And we, as a community, will be measured by our response to this and other scandals. The Talmud tells us that if someone who is well learned and observant is honest in business and speaks pleasantly, then others respond, "Happy are those who taught him Torah and woe to those who have not studied Torah, for look how fine are the ways and how righteous the deeds of this person who studied Torah."

But if someone who is observant is also dishonest and disrespectful, of him people say, "Woe to him who studied Torah and woe to those who taught him Torah, for look how corrupt are the deeds of this person" (Yoma 86a).

Because my pride in the Torah and my self-respect as an Orthodox Jew are tied to the representation my community makes to the world at large, I feel compelled to make a public statement about this matter. As a rabbi, I feel obliged to educate the community that such behavior is despicable and will not be tolerated. I am likewise impelled by the Mishna that reminds us that concealing a Chillul Hashem will always be unsuccessful: "Whoever desecrates the name of Heaven in private will ultimately be punished in public" (Pirke Avot 4:4). And when denials and attempts to conceal information are ultimately revealed, there is then an even greater Chillul Hashem.

I am relieved by the reports of a decision by Rabbi Zalman Auerbach, zecher tzaddik livrachah, delegitimizing the father's claim and maintaining the young girl's single status. But why did it take so long for this decision to become public? Why was it not implemented when it was decreed months ago? Surely this would have relieved the anguish of the victims and have prevented the public scandal that unfolded.

I support the efforts of Rabbi Gedaliah D. Shwartz, head of the beth din of the Rabbinical Council of America, and other leading scholars and decision makers of Jewish law who are earnestly evaluating the appropriate halachic means to prevent this abuse in the future. I call upon the members of the community to forewarn those who might consider this or other means of blackmail and extortion in dealing with their halachic obligations to grant a get, that such unscrupulous behavior will no longer be tolerated. I call upon parents and teachers to train their children to respect the integrity of all human beings and not to abuse our sacred and sensitive tradition for their own profane ends.

Books

By Bernard Baskin

Judaism: Myth, Legend, History & Custom from the Religious to the Secular, by Abraham J. Arnold (Robert Davies Publishing, $23.99 (paper)).

The author of this challenging book is an atheist. Nevertheless, for close to 50 years he has been intensely involved in the Jewish community as editor of the Jewish Western Bulletin, social activist and national president of the Canadian Jewish Historical Society.

As a secular humanist he feels kinship with the over 50 per cent of American Jews who are not religiously affiliated and with perhaps an equal number of Israelis who "are not brought up with the strictures of the Torah and receive no traditional education."

He has written this work, Arnold asserts, "To explain to my children and grandchildren how I see my Jewishness and to give them an opportunity to think about their own identity ... without necessarily becoming associated with a synagogue."

He is ambiguous about circumcision. "The humanist secular Jewish view suggests that the surgical circumcision practice be separated from the ceremonial birth celebration of a baby. Parents should be free to consider what weight they want to give to medical evidence on circumcision before deciding on a brit milah."

How do secular Jews celebrate Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur? They "find it appropriate to reflect on the moral quality of their lives and on how to improve themselves, through contemplation and discussion. And while ritual need not be entirely rejected, it is not required to seek the desired results."

Bar and bat mitzvah need not be "tied exclusively to the Torah." A secular ceremony can be built around a speech by the celebrant on a well-known figure in Jewish history.

The major question for Jewish secularists is simply this: Can a purely cultural or ethnic form of Judaism be transmitted from one generation to another? The evidence overwhelmingly is in the negative. Nostalgia, family loyalty, knowledge of Yiddish, liberal ideals and values, a clutch of denatured ceremonies and rituals — these do not provide effective barriers to assimilation.

Arnold regards the views of Albert Einstein as "the epitome of a secular humanist credo for Judaism." But Einstein's children did not remain Jews.

Unhappily many Jewish personalities who enrich humanity with their genius do not leave Jewish descendants.

I wonder why Arnold does not examine the philosophy of Mordecai Kaplan who, in his reconstruction of Judaism, attempted a faith without God but rich in culture and ideals? Why persist in secular Judaism that derives from the socialist-Yiddishist milieu of Eastern Europe, when Reform and Conservative Judaism allow for a broad restructuring of traditional beliefs and affirmations?

This honest, informative and deeply felt book highlights a major concern of every thoughtful Jew: how to find a living, congenial faith and how to transmit it to their children and grandchildren.

for Rivka and Shira

Kaddish will not be necessary
let there be no eulogies no plaques or memorial funds

detour the cemetery
don't rend clothes or place
pebbles on my granite shoulders

I won't be where I've been lowered
I will be found in you only in you for those who want to remember me they need only be with you to see who I was when no one was looking let there be no modesty, fanfare

From Anguish to Hope

By LAURA ROSEN
Special to The CJN

Anguish to Hope, a mission sponsored by the United Israel Appeal of Canada and Canadian Jewish Federations, took a group of Canadian university students to the pre-World War II Jewish communities in Czechoslovakia and Poland, followed by a stay in Israel.

Eighty students from 25 colleges and universities across Canada participated in the mission that takes place every two years.

The students also took a two-day side trip to Jordan, a historic opportunity to meet with a group of Jordanian university students. (For the University of Jordan this was the first time ever it had hosted a group of Jewish students.) The two groups exchanged views on a variety of subjects, including their pre-conceived notions about each other

"It was a major highlight to go to Jordan," said Marla Greenspoon, 22, who recently graduated with a BA in management from McGill.

"I don't know exactly what I was expecting, but they are students just like us ... We talked to them about issues like the peace process and their feelings about Jews and Israel.

"They have mixed feelings about Jews. Some of them feel that King Hussein made a spontaneous decision about the peace process, and all of the sudden said, 'Let's be friends.' They didn't really agree with that. But others were ecstatic. Still, they said that it will take time to get used to the peace process because they were brought up to hate Jews!"

Greenspoon said all their conversations were in English and although none of them are likely to be in contact again, she thinks the Jordanians "liked the perspective" of the Jewish students.

GUEST VOICES

Eli Rubenstein, the United Israel Appeal of Canada professional who accompanied the group, said the meeting with Jordanian students would not have been possible if it weren't for the peace process. But, he added, after the group had left Jordan, a complaint was filed with the university because Jewish students wearing kippot had been seen on a Jordanian university campus.

"It is a situation that is kind of 'two steps forward, one step back.' On the one hand, you have Canadian Jewish students speaking to Jordanian students in Jordan. Not so long ago, that would have been unthinkable," said Rubenstein. "On the other hand, it is unsettling that a religious symbol like a kippah could prove to be an object of complaint for some ... at a time when peace is supposed to be the common goal."

Michelle Volgyi, 23, a York university student from Toronto, is one course away from finishing her BA in psychology.

"It was very odd to be in Poland. For me, Poland always meant the camps. Then I arrived in the country and saw cities that were completely Americanized. The strangest thing is that if you drive half an hour out of the city, you are in the camps. How do those people live there?

"I have never been happier to land in Israel. We had a chance to welcome a plane full of olim from the former Soviet Union. I always knew it was important to have a Jewish state, but this made it even clearer," because now Jews have somewhere to go.

Jennifer Kurtz, 20, a Toronto student currently studying music at McGill, talked about the last program the group attended in Poland – a tribute concert in Warsaw honoring Righteous Gentiles who had saved Jewish lives during the Holocaust.

"It was vital for us to recognize the role of Righteous Gentiles, especially since so many others sat back and allowed such inhumane and brutal things happen to the Jewish people.

These Poles who risked their lives to save their fellow Jews demonstrated that individuals have the power to follow their hearts and resist evil," she said.

"In light or in darkness, remember the Crown."

THE Baycrest Campaigner

The dynamic duo of Judy Scheininger and Neil Nisker are joining forces again.
Having co-chaired the Campaign Cabinet of Operation Exodus in 1989, Judy and Neil have teamed up again to spearhead the Major Gifts Division for the Baycrest...Imagine Our Future Without It Campaign.

Judy Scheininger
Co-chair

Neil Nisker
Co-chair

Separately they are both leaders in the community. Neil is currently chairing the Investment Committee at Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation and is a past chair of Toronto's United Jewish Appeal campaign, Judy, is a past chair of both the Toronto United Jewish Appeal Campaign and the Mother's Association of Associated Hebrew Schools. In addition to being two members of our nine-chair team and guiding Major Gifts, Scheininger and Nisker have also taken on some other responsibilities.
Neil is the Chair representative to the Communications committee and Judy is responsible for coordinating most of our awareness events.

Neil Nisker comes to Baycrest with a strong family connection. "I don't know very many people whose lives have not been affected by Baycrest. Three of my four grandparents were in Baycrest and received wonderful care during the latter part of their lives," said Nisker. He pointed out that Baycrest was the last place that he saw his grandparents alive, "It was evident then that they were being treated with the utmost respect. Now, years later, the tradition of 'honouring thy mother and father' continues to permeate every level of service."

But times change. The existing building has served our clients well for many years. We must move on to a more specialized environment for those we serve now. We must create a new environment that better reflects the traditions upon which Baycrest was founded.

Judy Scheininger added "Baycrest is at the leading edge in learning how to care for and treat disorders that occur in the elderly. As our community ages it will be Baycrest that will be there to meet our needs and we must be prepared."

There is so much to be done in the field of research associated with aging. Baycrest is uniquely positioned to contribute significantly to new advances in helping older adults to live better lives.

And there will always be new clients for us to serve -- in new ways, with a new kind of energy, compassion and effectiveness.

"That is why this Campaign is so vital to our community's future. Just as generations before us responded to the needs of their time, we must have the vision to plan for our future" says Scheininger.

Neil Nisker and Judy Scheininger are co-chairs dedicated to the success of this Campaign. Both are committed to fulfilling our promise and continuing our tradition.

Your gift to the Baycrest Campaign will help Baycrest to build the future. Is there any more compelling reason to give?

Continuing dialogue encouraged

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) officials have agreed on the importance of a continuing dialogue on Polish-Jewish relations, following a meeting at CJC national headquarters with Poland's ambassador to Canada, Tadeusz Diem.

Congress welcomed Diem's announcement of the recent appointment by Poland of an ambassador-at-large for Polish-Jewish relations.

CJC's meeting with Diem centred on two issues: recent public anti-Semitic remarks made by a Polish priest and the restoration of Jewish property.

CJC president Goldie Hershon had written to the ambassador to convey her anger and disappointment over President Lech Walesa's silence in the wake of an anti-Semitic sermon delivered last month in Gdansk by Rev. Henryk Jankowski.

"We registered our community's anger at the statement and more particularly, the painfully long delay before the official response from President Walesa was issued. The president's statement was not viewed as entirely satisfactory since, while it addressed anti-Semitism generally, it failed to condemn specifically Jankowski's comments," Hershon said.

In his response, Diem wrote: "I deeply regret the abhorrent remarks by Rev. Henryk Jankowski and stress that they are not state-sanctioned. The individuals who mutter such sentiments are by no means the Polish state, which is governed by a constitution that both protects minorities and prohibits hatemongering."

He pointed out that both Poland's foreign minister and its minister of justice have condemned Rev. Jankowski's comments.

Diem confirmed that a criminal investigation of the remarks is underway.

As for Nazi-seized Jewish property in Poland, Diem said a "reprivatization bill" to address the matter is likely to be discussed in the Polish parliament next autumn.

Kaplans retire from operating paper

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Publisher-editor Sam Kaplan and his wife, senior editor Mona Kaplan, who have operated Vancouver's Jewish Western Bulletin weekly newspaper, for 35 years, recently announced their retirement.

The new publisher is 30-year-old Andrew Buerger. Buerger comes to Vancouver from Birmingham, Mich., where he was marketing director of the Detroit Jewish News.

Buerger's family operates four weekly anglo-Jewish newspapers: Detroit Jewish News, Baltimore Jewish Times, Palm Beach Jewish Times and Atlanta Jewish Times.

Buerger has moved the Bulletin offices from the Jewish area to downtown Vancouver and says he will overhaul the paper technologically "and move into the era of desktop publishing." This, he says, will speed up production and make it possible for the paper to be more up-to-date with its news.

Although he will concentrate on local news, Buerger said the Bulletin "will cover issues from the Pacific Northwest to the Middle East."

In a tribute to the Kaplans published in the Vancouver Sun, columnist Trevor Lautens said the Bulletin "is just what a good ethnic paper should be. It's cosy, lively, local, international, inclusive, full of names and thought-provoking issues. The Bulletin reflects the diversity of the community."

Saidye Bronfman remembered

Prime Minister Jean Chrétien and his wife Aline were among the estimated 800 in attendance, as was Quebec Public Security Minister Serge Menard. The theatre holds only about 300, but television screens were set up in the art gallery and in the adjacent Y's auditorium. More waited outside on the street, among them many of the elderly to whom Saidye was known as a community worker.

Phyllis Lambert recalled her mother as "naturally elegant, funny, spirited, wise and supportive," adding that she loved gossip and "could be very direct when something was awry ... She was the most honest person I've ever known."

The SBC was the natural venue for this farewell because, Lambert said, it represented so much she cared about — the Y, the arts, education and children.

No eulogy to Bronfman would be complete without talking about her love affair with her husband during their 49-year marriage, until his death in 1971.

Lambert said that to her final days, Bronfman "always kept a photo of Sam in view. He was the centre of her life."

Lambert is founder and director of the Canadian Centre for Architecture.

Grandson Jean de Gunzburg, son of Bronfman's eldest child, Aileen Minda, who died in 1985, said Bronfman was "the unifying figure" of the family, which now has 11 grandchildren and 18 great-grandchildren.

Granddaughter Ellen Bronfman Hauptman said as a young girl she called Bronfman "Greatest Granny," because she seemed such a "larger than life" figure — "sweet yet tough as nails."

Another grandson, Sam Bronfman II, described the funeral as "a celebration of a life that was as magnificent as it was long." Bronfman encouraged her children and grandchildren "to leave this world a better place than they found it," he said.

His father Edgar and uncle Charles, he said, attribute their success to their mother's inspiration. Edgar is chair and Charles co-chair of The Seagram Company Ltd.

"I visited my grandmother just two weeks ago and her mind was agile and her sense of humor intact. She knew every one of her grandchildren and their children by name, and wanted an update on every one."

The funeral was conducted by Rabbi Ira Grussgott and Cantor Sidney Dworkin of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, but the formal eulogy was delivered by Rabbi Joshua Shmidman of Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem, who befriended Bronfman in recent years.

He lauded her as the Montreal Jewish community's "first lady. We will never see her like again."

In a written statement, Canadian Jewish Congress president Goldie Hershon called Bronfman "a woman of valor" who was "by the side" of her husband Sam throughout the 23 years he served as Congress president (1939 to 1962) and was a strong community leader in her own right.

B'nai Brith Canada executive vice-president Frank Dimant praised her work in developing community institutions, supporting Israel in its early statehood and contributing to Canadian culture.

Born Saidye Rosner on Dec. 9, 1896, Bronfman moved to Montreal in 1924 with Sam, whom she had married in 1922.

In 1943, she was presented with the title of Officer of the Order of the British Empire on the recommendation of King George VI, in recognition of her effort in establishing and heading the Jewish branch of the Canadian Red Cross Society during World War II.

Some 7,000 women volunteered for the branch, preparing packages for men overseas, under Bronfman's full-time volunteer direction.

From 1929 to 1935, she was president of the Young Women's Hebrew Association. Brenda Baron, who worked with Bronfman on the Y board in the late 1930s, recalled that she had a great sensitivity to the needs of the mainly young, working women who used the Y, despite the wide socio-economic gulf between them. "She didn't talk down to anyone ... she was understanding, cooperative, and listened to people."

The staff of The Canadian Jewish News wish to convey their condolences to Charles Bronfman and to the entire Bronfman family on the passing of Saidye Rosner Bronfman, of blessed memory.

An open letter to the family of the late

SAIDYE ROSNER BRONFMAN, O.B.E. ל"ז

"A woman of valour who can find?
Her price is far above rubies."

We join with the World Community in mourning the passing of Saidye Bronfman, an extraordinary woman. At the same time, we celebrate the greatness of a long and remarkably productive life in which Saidye Bronfman contributed immensely to the well-being of both the Jewish and general communities. She has left her mark in many ways, but particularly in the children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren who live to carry on the great traditions of Saidye and Sam Bronfman.

With sincere condolences,

UIA responds to column

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A viewpoint column in an Israeli magazine misrepresents Jewish fundraising in Canada; and it is being used to promote the Israeli settler movement's political agenda, according to a senior official of the United Israel Appeal (UIA).

The article in the July 13 issue of the Jerusalem Report is misleading on two grounds, said Steve Ain, executive vice-president of the UIA.

It claims that less than $143,000 was collected for Israel in the first three months of 1995 compared to the $2.5 million in the same period the year before; the column also suggests that the alleged drop in contributions indicates "Canadians have lost faith in the [Yitzhak] Rabin government and the peace process," Ain said.

The article by Yisrael Harel, chair of the Council of Jewish Settlements in Judea, Samaria and Gaza (Yesha), is wrong on both accounts, he said.

The UIA transferred $3.8 million (US) to the Jewish Agency (JA) in the first five months of 1995, Ain said.

Harel's use of the $143,000 figure would be like examining a retailer's books and seeing slow sales in January and February, when the bulk of business was done in November and December, Ain said.

"Statistics are like people. If they're tortured long enough, they'll tell you what you want," he said.

The UIA has written to the Jerusalem Report to correct the information contained in the article. Ain acknowledged "there are a few who've refused to give because of the policies of the Labor government." But, he added, "there are an equal number who refused because of the policies of the [previous] Likud government.

"The point is that the policies have nothing to do with whether the campaign is up or down."

In the article, titled Why Burg Can't Sleep, Harel suggested JA chair Avraham Burg can't sleep for worrying about a "crisis situation" in Diaspora fundraising for Israel.

Harel suggests "the main reason for the crisis is to be found in the policies of the Israeli government. Recognition of the PLO and the traumatic handshake between Rabin and [Yasser] Arafat set off a crisis of confidence which injured those Diaspora Jews who are closest to the State, the people and the Land of Israel, and who are therefore the most generous donors."

Ain disputed that argument, pointing out the UIA transferred to the JA about $24-$25 million (US) in each of 1993 and '94. "I expect similar numbers in 1995. It might be down by $1 million. It depends on the amount raised in campaigns" and how much of the amounts raised will be retained for use in Canada, he said.

Harel's article was distributed by a "low profile" organization called Concerned Jewish Citizens (CJC). A spokesman for CJC, who would only give his name as Sheldon, said the organization clips articles from a variety of public sources and sends them by fax to hundreds of individuals and organizations in Canada.

"CJC is a non-political organization that supports the survival of Israel and the well-being of Jews around the world," Sheldon said.

The two-year old group is not affiliated with Yesha or involved in fundraising for it. CJC was formed "because we're concerned about what's going on in Israel. We're concerned that the present government is doing harm to Israel and to the Jewish people," he said.

Sheldon declined to identify the people behind the organization, saying "it's just some Jewish people who pay money to support it."

Jerusalem Award presented

By ELIAS LEVY
CJN Staff Reporter

QUEBEC CITY — Roger Bertrand, the speaker of the Quebec National Assembly, was recently presented with the Jerusalem Award.

A delegation of Montreal Jewish community leaders headed by Thomas Hecht, outgoing chair of the Canada-Israel Committee, made the presentation in the Quebec legislature's Salon de la présidence.

In his speech, Hecht urged Bertrand, who is also chair of the International Association of Francophone Parliamentarians, to continue to advocate strongly for the membership of the State of Israel in la Francophonie.

He also asked Bertrand to do his utmost to encourage exchanges between Israeli and Quebec members of parliament.

Canadian Zionist Federation national president Zave Ettinger said the Jerusalem Award, given by Jerusalem Mayor Ehud Olmert and World Zionist Organization chair Avraham Burg, honors friends of the Jewish State.

On being presented with the award by Daniel Gal, Israel consul general in Montreal, Bertrand said of the Quebec Jewish community: "Your community is an exemplary model and a valuable source of inspiration for all Québécois. Your commitment to the most needy and your solidarity are part of the noble ideals and values which the Jews have always fiercely defended."

Bertrand also reiterated his intention of continuing to work actively to have Israel become a full member of la Francophonie.

Jewish Book Committee awards prizes to writers

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A young Jewish member of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Peter Ormshaw, of Regina, is the first winner of the Henry Fuerstenberg award for poetry.

"Peter is up north patrolling Indian reserves," said his friend, Jeff Henritz of Picton, on accepting the prize.

Ormshaw's book, The Purity of Arms, won the award donated in memory of the father of Prof. Adam Fuerstenberg, chair of the Jewish Book Committee, which recently distributed awards totalling $3,600 to eight writers at the Koffler Centre.

A carpenter by trade, Henry Fuerstenberg sold a camera to finance his family's trip to Canada, and bought a set of encyclopedias for his children with his first pay, his son told The CJN.

Another youngster, Shneur David Levine, who celebrated his Bar Mitzvah a few days later, accepted an award for Torah scholarship on behalf of his father, Rabbi Aaron Levine, principal of Eitz Chaim schools in Toronto. The author of To Comfort the Bereaved, which won the Penina Rubinoff Memorial Award, Rabbi Levine was attending a dinner for his predecessor.

The evening meant a reunion for fiction winner Gary Fagan of Toronto and the well known novelist and guest speaker, Morley Torgov, a Toronto lawyer.

Many years ago, Fagan interviewed Torgov for an article in the Lawyers Journal and brought along a copy of A Good Place To Come From to be autographed.

"At the time, Morley asked me when he would be able to sign one of my books, which he can do tonight," Fagan said. He won the prize for The Animals' Waltz.

Torgov recalled the time when, at the age of 17 in Sault Ste. Marie, he told his father that he wanted to be a writer.

"When do I ever need a writer?" his storekeeper father replied, throwing cold water on the idea.

"My father's writing ability was to scrawl 'Go to hell' at the top of an overdue invoice and send it back with insufficient postage, an old writer's trick," Torgov said.

Other award winners were: Prof. Andre Stein of Toronto, the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem prize, for Hidden Children: Forgotten Survivors of the Holocaust; Lillian Boraks-Nemetz of Vancouver, the Rachel Bessin prize for writing for young people, for The Old Brown Suitcase; Jack Kuper of Toronto, the Joseph and Faye Tannenbaum award for Holocaust literature, for After the Smoke Cleared; Sam Simchovitch of Toronto, the Izzy and Betty Kirshenbaum Foundation award for original translation from Yiddish, for his novel, Stepchild on the Vistula; and Grunia Slutsky-Knon of Montreal, the Kirshenbaum Foundation award for Yiddish, for Don't Look So Sad in the Window, who gave her acceptance speech in Yiddish.

Children draw pictures of Jerusalem for art contest

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Forty-eight images of Jerusalem, many featuring themes of peace and religious harmony, graced the rotunda of Toronto's Metro Hall for a recent one-week children's art exhibition.

The pictures were culled from 650 Canadian entries in an international art contest, Children of the World Draw Jerusalem at 3000, sponsored by Israel's Minister of Education Amnon Rubenstein and Ehud Olmert, mayor of Jerusalem.

The pictures will be displayed in Jerusalem in honor of the 3,000th anniversary of the establishment of the city as Israel's capital by King David. Twelve prizes will be awarded internationally, each including a week in Israel for a child and escort.

At a reception to mark the beginning of the Toronto exhibition, the artists, ranging in age from 7 to 14, were each presented with a keepsake poster and a book about Jerusalem from the Israeli Consulate and a Metro Toronto pin from the Metropolitan Toronto Council.

The consul general, along with Metro chairman Alan Tonks and the Metropolitan Toronto Council, were co-sponsors of the reception. Metro councillor Norman Gardner welcomed the crowd of 200 people and brought greetings on behalf of Tonks.

"Jerusalem is a symbol of our past and of our future," said Kurt Rothschild, national president of the Canadian Zionist Federation.

Jessica Parker, 9, used the shape of a Torah scroll as the starting point for her depiction of the city, which included three figures representing a Jew, a Muslim and a Christian. "That's sort of what makes up Israel," she told The CJN.

Rivka Birkan, 14, used a biblical allegory to make a point in her oil/acrylic/pastel painting. Absalom, who plotted a revolt against his father King David, is shown releasing a white dove to symbolize peace. To emphasize its importance, Rivka made sure it was the only white element in the picture.

'City of Peace'

"Jerusalem means the city of peace," said Israel's Consul General Dror Zeigerman, himself a Jerusalemite. "Freedom of worship is enjoyed [there] by Jews, Muslims and Christians."

Elysse Goody's depiction of Jerusalem includes the dove of peace. The 7-year-old Bialik student's picture is en route to Jerusalem as part of an international children's art contest.

Windsor dinner honors survivors

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

WINDSOR — Families of survivors, many of whom had not seen each other for years, gathered here recently for the 1995 Jewish National Fund (JNF) Negev Tribute Dinner, which this year honored Holocaust survivors who settled in the Windsor community.

In all, 74 survivors, 21 of whom are now deceased, settled here. Their histories were recorded in the tribute book.

The guest speaker, actor and human rights activist Ed Asner, is a cousin of Polish-born Windsor-area residents Abram and Libby Asner, both the sole survivors of their families.

Asner, who was introduced by Abram and Libby's daughter, Cheryl Gold, told of his rather remote-from-Judaism youth in his native Kansas City and his gradual transformation into an active member of various political and humanitarian organizations, including the Jewish Fund for Justice. He is currently a member of the advisory board of Israel Civil Rights and Peace.

Probably best known for his role as Lou Grant in the Mary Tyler Moore Show, Asner is the narrator of For The Living, a documentary chronicling the building of the Holocaust Museum in Washington.

The dinner for some 540 guests at the Caboto Club, was attended by Hamilton-based Keren Kayemeth emissary, Yoram Gordon.

Other speakers included Windsor JNF president, Jerry Goldberg; Jewish National Fund of Canada executive vice-president, Avner Regev; consul general Dror Zeigerman and Ted J. Hochberg, president, Windsor Jewish Federation.

The dinner was chaired by Dr. Sharon Horlick, while Lillian and Adam Friedland and Olga and Samuel Honig were Negev Dinner co-chairs.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

On the Danforth, Saul Korman is The Boss

Bruce Springsteen may be The Boss, but on the Danforth Saul Korman is still the Boss-Man.

As one of Canada's premier men's wear retailers, Korry's carries an impressive collection of the ever-popular Hugo Boss line, which has carved out an enviable niche in men's business and formal dressing.

Saul's reign as King of The Danforth now spans several decades. Talk to him, and you'll be regaled by a variety of anecdotes on the colourful characters that have peopled the Danforth from the 1940's right up to the present day, including, in Saul's opinion, "the finest restauranteurs this city has to offer." Twist his arm, and he might even throw in a few words about himself and Korry's, the men's wear emporium of which he is president and chief spokesperson, as he holds court either in his castle at 569 Danforth or in one of the street's many restaurants of which he is so fond.

Walk with him along the Danforth, and you'll get an eye-opening picture of his celebrity status. Breezing from shop to shop, he's constantly greeted and accosted by friends, acquaintances and well-wishers. If they haven't been into Korry's in the past few weeks, Saul wants to know why. His notoriety rivals that of a politician, with the exception that — as Saul is quick to point out — he shoots straight from the hip and as such enjoys a decided edge in popularity over the average Parliament Hill type. (Saul for Mayor? The idea's intriguing, but he's infinitely more valuable "on the playing field" at 569 Danforth Avenue easing his beloved Boss suits onto the backs of satisfied customers. He's "not ready to go behind the bench just yet."

Saul for Mayor?

Boasting a clientele liberally sprinkled with entertainment figures, Maple Leafs, Blue Jays, Argonauts, and other sports celebrities including figure skater Elvis Stojko, Korry's appears to be the shopping destination of all the "good sports."

When speaking about his Boss, Canali, Versace Classics by V2 and Lagerfeld collections, Saul's normal high enthusiasm reaches a fever pitch. "They just keep getting better and better," he says. "That's what separates the top designers from the run-of-the-mill and the house labels. When they bring out a new collection, they don't just do it to put goods on the rack for another season. They're giving you the essence of fashion design: new cuts, new fabrics, new variations on old themes . . . fresh looks. Looking good is essential in the business world. We know that. We've always known that. But looking good in something different every day is an art."

Saul quickly downplays any suggestion that this strategy will also, coincidentally, help him sell more clothes. "Look," he chides. "If the same salesman walks through your door every day wearing the same suit, at some point you're going to say, "Oh no, not you again!" But if that same salesman walks in every day wearing a different suit — and a good one to boot — your reaction will be, "You again! What are you selling me this time?" You see the difference? The man who takes the trouble to put on a fresh face every day is showing you that he's not unidimensional, that there's some variety to him. Our wives know this, but we don't always know it."

Saul continues: "The funny thing is that even the guy who works basically alone in his own small shop or office — and that includes a lot of our clients — likes to vary his attire every day because he wants to appear new and fresh to himself. It's like rediscovering yourself. When you look in the mirror every morning, do you want to see the same old you, or a new, dashing, and re-invigorated you? [I had my typical grab-the-first-thing-that-comes-to-hand-and-throw-it-on-my-back kind of morning, and am suitably ashamed]. "Precisely," says Saul. And if the way you dress has that kind of impact on you, imagine how it impacts on the people you're trying to do business with?" Trying to escape Saul's logic is a bit like trying to find open ice against the New Jersey Devils. But perhaps that's as it should be; you don't get to be an icon for no reason, and 43 years of success on the Danforth serving many of the same customers year after year suggests that someone at 569 Danforth Avenue is doing a devilishly good job.

Speaking of longevity, Saul's "linemates" are no slouches themselves. The various members of his staff have literally hundreds of years of combined experience in the men's wear business. Gene Bialys, Franco Gagliardi, Frank Smith, Veronika Toth, Catherine Scott, Celina Han, Rodolfo Santia, Tony Marinelli, Lyndon Jordan, Chee Chiew Chow, Charlie Strazzeri, Michael Korman, Laura Korman, Jodi Korman-Gauthier, and Myrna Korman all work hand in hand with the Boss-man to ensure that clients get the ultimate in service. For the men who shop there, this means getting the right fit every time, in the right garment that flatters and compliments their physique, body type and characteristics, "right down to the colour of your hair," says Saul. Wardrobe consultation is free to Korry's clients, and most take full advantage of it.

Two for one

In these recession-ravaged times, however, quality and service aren't always enough to make the cash register ring. Enter Korry's "Two For One" offer. Available on most goods in the store, including Roberto and now Lagerfeld, the Two For One allows you to buy one suit at the regular price and get another of equal value absolutely free. Ditto for jackets, slacks, and shirts. Since he introduced the concept a few years ago, Korman's Two For One has been so popular that a number of other men's wear retailers have followed suit.

The Boss doesn't mind. Korman makes a point of never bad-mouthing his competition, a trait that, among others, has earned him considerable respect in the industry. "I don't believe in saying anything bad about any competitor," says Saul. "Never have. Besides that, I'm too busy saying good things about Korry's and inviting people to come in and see for themselves." Saul's positive statements can be heard regularly on Toronto Talks 640 AM (with Bill Carroll), CFRB 1010 AM (with John Oakly), Q107 FM (with Joey Vendetta), as well as The Fan 590 AM and All-News Radio 680 AM (flying solo). In print, his comments can be seen in this and other newspapers. Both media are no doubt eternally grateful for Saul's urgency to communicate his message. "I believe in advertising," he says. "I built my business on it. There isn't a man in this city who hasn't heard of Korry's. They may not all have been in my shop yet, but they've heard of it. When you tell people something often enough, they start to listen. Then when they come in and discover that what you've been telling them is true, odds are you've got a customer."

If Korman's selling skills and personality could be bottled and sold, the Coca-Cola Company might have reason to be concerned about market share.

Astoria defines the Danforth

Think "Danforth", and you're liable to think "Astoria." In the 20 years since it opened, this venerable "institution of higher dining" has come to symbolize the culinary qualities the Danforth is known for: great food, great quality, and great value.

Indeed, many of Astoria's original customers are still regulars two decades later, and wouldn't dream of going anywhere else.

The reasons for this loyalty are manifold. First and foremost, the food: your favourite Greek dishes are cooked to perfection and served up in staggering portions. Astoria's now-famous "souvlaki window", always a beehive of activity, is an indelible image of Danforth life. In fact, Astoria has become so well-known for its souvlaki that "people sometimes forget we have a complete Greek menu," says personable manager George Baboulas. Like an actor who plays a part so well he becomes typecast, Astoria has come to be defined by the shish kebob, perhaps hiding other jewels on the menu like its hearty moussaka, exquisite broiled halibut and salmon steaks – and Greek appetizers like kalamari and saganaki, if you can keep your souvlaki craving at bay long enough to sample them.

Location and atmosphere are other Astoria assets. For a big restaurant, it's remarkably cozy, due to its corner location, dual outdoor patios (the Danforth's largest), and quiet, rich green-and-chestnut-brown interior, ingeniously compartmentalized to offer small-room intimacy with a large-room ambience.

Favouring tradition over trends, Astoria has nevertheless introduced a cappucino machine and a dessert menu. (The fact that it's thrived for 20 years without offering dessert tells you just how much people love the food here).

Heading eastbound on Bloor, you know you're on the Danforth once you hit Broadview; but you don't really feel it until Astoria's white facade with its pale blue trim leaps joyously into view, bidding you "Welcome to the Danforth" in words that the food lover in you understands so well.

Home-made ice cream creates force field at 400 Danforth

You're walking along the Danforth, minding your own business. Suddenly, you're being served a "Life Sentence" Belgian waffle with chocolate chip ripple ice cream, topped with bananas, fudge brownie, fudge and peanuts.

You're now just another inmate "doing time" at Demetre's desserts – swallowed up by a vortex of irresistible cones, sundaes, splits, gourmet coffees, cakes — and the best ice cream you ever tasted.

Relax. It's a crime so common that the dessert emporium sells "over 2000 litres of ice cream a week" in peak season, according to owner Gary Theodorakakis. The fact that it's home-made the old fashioned way (no additives, no preservatives) reduces somewhat the guilt of this unbelievably pleasurable indulgence. Demetre's is one of the very few places you'll find this "Real McCoy" (N.B.: 2962 Bloor St. West (Demetre's 2nd location) is equally unsafe for the sweet of tooth.

You've served your life sentence, but there's no rest for the wicked. It's time for a "Streetcar Named Devour" crêpe, with cocoa-chocolate ice cream topped with fresh strawberries and fudge. Wash it down with a cappucino, espresso, frappé, steamer, or freshly brewed coffee (40 varieties in all).

What a place to pop the big question! Sweeten up your prey with a "Romancing The Cone" Banana Split (white chocolate, cocoa-chocolate ice cream and praline hazelnut ice cream smothered with fudge toppings, capped with a cone). And get the ring ready.

Now that (s)he's said yes, celebrate with an Aristo-crème dark chocolate truffle sundae (2 scoops of cocoa-chocolate ice cream rolled in chocolate curls, served on a bed of fudge with chocolate chunks and sprinkled with Dutch cocoa powder).

Now that you've enjoyed the main course, it's time for dessert . . .

Tony's a step up in open-air Greek dining

What goes up must come down ... but if you climb the seven short steps leading to Tony's on the Danforth, the culinary high you'll experience should last at least until your next visit.

Looking down at the Danforth as you dine is an unusual, and ultimately refreshing, experience. From your open-air perch some ten feet above street level (the restaurant is a sort of giant balcony), you have a slightly better view of the flow of humanity, and less exposure to noise and traffic fumes. The decor – a sweeping panorama of gentle white stucco, sky blue, and sunny terracotta tile girded by an elegant white wrought-iron railing – is probably one of the best duplications of a Greek seascape this side of Greece. You can almost feel the soft breezes on your cheek, and tables directly overlooking the street are recommended if you can get them.

Appropriately, you'll find some seafood treasures on the menu, notably the Whole Red Snapper, broiled to perfection and smothered in lemon oil sauce, served with potatoes and vegetables or cooked horta.

Highly recommended house specials include the Milk-fed Lamb Chops, slowly broiled to ensure tenderness and served with vegetables and potatoes. For a gargantuan feast, try the Chef's Meat Platter for Two: lamb chops, chicken breast, New York sirloin steak and quails with roast potatoes and vegetables.

It is the appetizers and dips, however, that owner Tony Vamvakas is most proud of. A fabulous selection is highlighted by the Taramosalata: you won't find any better, anywhere.

The unique open-air ambience of this sunny spot — and the tasty fare it serves — make it a must-try for any serious Danforth-goer.

Byzas offers New York-style glamour, panache at uptown prices

The calm before the storm: Byzas in late afternoon. Within two hours of this picture being taken, all seats were filled. Note the mosaics on the arches. For information and reservations, call (416) 778-1100.

From the first morsel of fresh bread you dip in the extra-virgin olive oil that accompanies it, to the last exquisite bite of the heavenly desserts made on the premises by Pastry Chef Cassandra Bateman, your visit to Byzas is a gateway to some of the finest culinary delights Toronto has to offer.

Stunning and sprawling, Byzas (pronounced Bee-zass) is at the vanguard of a new breed of restaurants that may soon have people comparing Toronto with New York or San Francisco as a dining destination. With its gleaming honey-and-molasses-toned hardwood floor, rampant Aztec-printed benches, spacious enclaved U booths, mosaicized ceilings and sprawling patio, Byzas provides an altogether extraordinary environment for people to dine in, to see, and to be seen. (Like its sibling restaurant Christina's the brainchild of brothers John and Dean Kekkas, but altogether different in cuisine and decor, Byzas has become a haunt of luminaries from the entertainment world. But whether or not you see a familiar face from the theatre or the silver screen, you are liable to see a familiar face from the community, especially on Saturday nights.

Saturday night, some familiar faces

Offering New york style flair and panache at uptown prices is one reason that Byzas has become a haven for ex-Americans now resident in Canada, and the unofficial home of the American Club. But whether you're from south of the border, north of the border, or abroad, you'll find the fare (mainly Greek but with Middle Eastern, Italian and Continental nuances) irresistible. Fairly brimming with zest and panache, the menu is continually updated to introduce new flavours to a captive clientele. Current favourites among the appetizers include Saganaki (pan-fried cheese flambé) and Mediterranean Spring Rolls with mango sauce and wild greens. From Byzas' in-house smokery, try the succulently seductive Grilled Smoked Portobello Mushrooms.

Personal pizzas reasonably priced

Personal pizzas are plentifully sized and ever-so-reasonably priced ($8.95 and $9.95); an ongoing favourite is the Pizza Con Polla (Chicken, sun-dried tomato pesto and feta cheese). Among the pastas, the Linguini Puttanesca with anchovies, capers and black olives, tomatoes and roasted garlic is a standout. On the entrée front, an exciting new addition is the Seafood Stew with shrimp, mussels, clams, squid and fresh fish served with lime aioli and garlic toast.

All items are cooked to order, meaning they may take a little longer to prepare; but the wait is worth it. Enhancing the appeal are all-natural ingredients, the absence of preservatives, and edible flowers.

Byzas offers Danforth diners a few important innovations:

- The aforementioned in-house smokery (whence the smoked portobello mushrooms, smoked quails, and a smoked marinated vegetable plate);
- Toronto's first reverse osmosis water filtration system, ensuring absolute purity of the water used in the kitchen and served at your table;
- Accomplished musicians (Dennis Keldie, Conrad Kipping, and George Saponetis) whose sweet strains on guitar, mandolin and accordian will serenade you through supper from Thursday through Sunday;
- A Greek salad unlike any you've ever tasted (more on that later);
- Its own in-house Pastry Chef (Cassandra Bateman), whose offerings are so exquisite that Byzas has become a late-night dessert destination in its own right, quite apart from its mealtime delights. "Killer desserts" is an understatement when describing Byzas' après-souper temptations. The Tiramisu (discussed in these pages before) is exactly as a tiramisu should be — an intricate ensemble of flavours and textures, interwoven yet distinct. The Pear Tatin (carmelized upside down pear tart with dark rum crème anglaise and warm caramel sauce) has become such a favourite that Dean suggests they "may grow our own pear trees on site." If your tastes tend to simpler dessert fare, try the Clafoutis (custard cake with seasonal fruit).

Killer desserts

One shift in the Byzas menu since the restaurant opened to rave reviews in December '94 is the addition of more Greek dishes. Though the wide-ranging Mediterranean selections have been well received by clients, Dean says that his customers "expect Greek food when they come to the Danforth." So without changing the essential character of the menu, Byzas has quietly increased its overall Greek content.

But flashes of innovative brilliance still abound. For example, you'll find the Byzas Greek salad deliciously different from any other on the Danforth: the Greek feta, kalamata olives and plum tomatoes you'd expect team up with red onions, mustard greens, red oak and arugula leaves you wouldn't for a light and delightful surprise capped by lemon oregano dressing.

Though Byzas goes to the head of the class in appearance and culinary excellence, prices are considerably less than at many other outstanding restaurants. A full dinner for two with appetizer, main course, dessert and a couple of glasses of wine from their extensive wine list can run you well under $90 including taxes and tip, yet for as little as $8.95 you can order a pizza that's a complete meal in itself. At this price, you'll find the portion you're given dwarfs that offered in many other popular eateries, while conceding absolutely nothing in imagination, taste, and freshness. "Freshness is an absolute", says Dean. "No MSG, no chemicals, no preservatives, no frozen prepared foods. All our sauces are made from scratch."

With so many pluses on its balance sheet, it's no surprise that Byzas has become a favourite spot for both corporate luncheons and private functions such as birthday parties, bar mitzvah parties, and even wedding receptions.

Bring on the free-range chicken breast, the Byzas Greek salad with its organically grown greens, and the pear tatin, but hold the pear tree. This restaurant has enough growing for it already.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

The Friendly Greek really is friendly

One visit to The Friendly Greek should be enough to convince you that the "Friendly" isn't just a buzzword.

It's "friendly" as in the way you're greeted when you enter the restaurant, whether by founder Chris Christodoulou, his charming wife Soula (the "official" hostess, though everyone welcomes you here), partner Nick Kostis, or any other member of the staff who's present to usher you in.

"Friendly" as in the courteous service you receive throughout your visit from waiters who really know how to treat you and who understand the menu.

"Friendly" as in the large bowl of superb sesame seed garlic bread that's plunked on your table — no charge! — before you order an entrée.

"Friendly" as in the relaxed atmosphere and inviting decor (a colourful panorama of white stuccoed walls painted with seascapes and other Greek scenes).

"Friendly", as in the huge outdoor patio that rubs shoulders with the Danforth.

Last but not least, "Friendly" as in prices. It's really quite incredible what you get here for your dining dollar. In the best Danforth tradition, portions are huge, yet most entrées are priced under $10. Most appetizers are $3.50 or less, and you can order a bottle of wine from the extensive wine list for as little as $15.95. Desserts are also reasonably priced, and you'll find the Greek coffee ($1.50) an exceptionally tasty and compelling alternative to cappucino, which is also available. Soft drinks are only $1.25, and all side orders are so reasonably priced you'll think you're in a time warp.

Huge portions, yet most entrées under $10

Since opening in 1989, in fact, The Friendly Greek has been so "big about things" that it's no surprise that it has gotten bigger. From humble beginnings in an average-size space, it has doubled in size.

Charlie Martezos, one of the principals, has an easygoing manner that typifies the spirit in which The Friendly Greek operates — a fact undoubtedly responsible for the age range of its clients, which may be the widest of any restaurant on the Danforth. From large families with their babies in tow to young couples sowing the seeds of friendship to older couples reaping the harvest, all are welcome at The Friendly Greek and all are treated with the same dignity and respect. Whether you're ordering a full-scale meal or simply having a coffee and dessert,

Authentic Greek specialties

you'll be made to feel at home.

This easygoing atmosphere has made The Friendly Greek a favourite spot for birthday parties and other family celebrations.

The Friendly Greek exemplifies the qualities the Danforth has become famous for: traditional Greek food served in huge portions. Included among the dishes are a few truly authentic Greek recipes you're not liable to find elsewhere: a delicious Homemade Wine Sausage (two pieces) served with Greek salad, rice, roast potatoes, tzatziki and garlic bread, all for only $8.95; Ofto Kleftico (roast lamb the Friendly Greek way, prepared oil-free and served with lemon potatoes and Greek salad, garlic bread and tzatziki), only $9.95.

For a heavy-duty feast, try another Friendly Greek house specialty: the Hot Piklia For Two, with two pieces of lamb chops, two pieces of sausage, two pieces of seftalia, 2 pieces of quail, gyro, souvlaki and Greek salad, served with garlic sauce and garlic bread, all for only $27.95 (your odds of actually finishing this mammoth platter are about the same as the Maple Leafs going undefeated in '95-96, though we wish you and the "buds" best of luck).

A veteran of the Danforth, Christodoulou opened his first small restaurant in 1979 and developed it into one of the city's most successful establishments before selling it and opening The Friendly Greek. In fact, many of the dishes now available on the Danforth, including the ubiquitous souvlaki on a stick, were pioneered by him. In opening The Friendly Greek, his idea was simply to build the quintessential Danforth establishment, but when franchising opportunities knocked, he decided that maybe spreading the Greek concept further afield wasn't such a bad idea. A second Friendly Greek at 1415 Kennedy Road in Scarborough has proven equally successful, and additional franchises are slated to open soon in Mississauga and Brampton, with "two or three more" likely to appear within the coming year.

In order to maintain consistency and quality among franchises, says Martezos, chefs must be Danforth-trained or have an extensive background in Greek cuisine. "Both the cuisine and the look and feel of the original Friendly Greek are being maintained in new locations," says Martezos. "Of course, many of our customers will still want to come to the Danforth because of the ambience, but once they're in the door, we want them to feel they're in the original Friendly Greek regardless of which location they're at."

The Friendly Greek was one of some thirty restaurants that participated in the Tastes of Toronto festival held recently on Front Street. Occupying one of the six larger booths, The Friendly Greek was "a hit," says Martezos, and sold literally thousands of souvlakis. "The response was incredible," says Martezos. "We hade lineups upon lineups. We sold so many souvlakis that we almost forgot to feed ourselves."

Almost every week, it seems, another new restaurant opens on the Danforth — yet all the existing restaurants seem as busy as ever. Martezos attributes the ever-increasing flow of traffic to the fact that "Greeks are known for good food. In a Greek home, you're not allowed to leave the table until you're full." (A phenomenon that readers of this newspaper probably know something about). "So more good restaurants just mean more of a good thing, and people know they can come to the Danforth at almost any hour of the day or night — right into the wee hours of the morning — and have a great meal indoors or outdoors, in complete safety. What more can you ask?"

Nothing — except to be served by a Friendly Greek.

This pleasing depiction of a Greek scene appears on the Friendly Greek menu, and is typical of the physical environment and relaxed atmosphere you'll find in a Friendly Greek restaurant.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Ouzeri a Danforth delight for the eyes and the palate

Combining the naive charm of a child's finger painting with the sophistication of a mature artist's brush, Ouzeri landed on the Toronto restaurant scene with such a splash in 1990 that the ripple effect is still being felt, and the block-long line-ups that waited patiently on opening night have abated only slightly since.

The Ouzeri experience begins with the decor — a sensory festival unparalleled among Toronto dining establishments. In a radical departure from traditional restaurant frontage, whereby clients are funnelled in through a narrow entrance, Ouzeri fronted the entire restaurant with sliding garage-style glass doors (a concept often imitated since), baring its soul to the street in a style reminiscent of an architectural cross-section. The 3D effect is heightened by the restaurant's "landscape", which is staggered on four levels from the top level at back to the streetside patio at front. The gleaming standup bar is backed by walls awash with soft, irridescent blues and aquas that really feel like the sea. The walls and ceilings are festooned with hand-painted swirls of colour which, when examined more closely, reveal themselves as birds, animals, and fish — and some vaguer, almost Rorschachian shapes that will keep you guessing. Add the hum of a lively crowd and the seduction is complete — and you haven't even gotten to the menu yet!

Such is the visual delight of a visit to Ouzeri that you might almost be inclined to forgive average cuisine. Happily, you'll make no such compromise here, for the eclectic fare (authentically Greek throughout, without a hint of Canadianism) will have you dancing in your seat. (Such acts of spontaneity are not only tolerated but encouraged).

Variety with a capital "V"

From the extensive wine list through the appetizers to main dishes, the keynote of Ouzeri's cuisine is variety. First, the wines: there are some 65 varieties you can order by the glass, as opposed to the mere handful offered in most other establishments. Then the appetizers, tantalizing and fetchingly presented: there are some 20 to choose from. (Or you can sample all 20 for only $8.95 per person, a meal in itself). Some 20 seafood selections (try the Prawns with Feta and Wine), four choices of fowl, a dozen meat selections (nothing could make you forget bubie's chicken fricasee, but Ouzeri's Lamb Shoulder Fricasee for Bill gives it a run for its money), a dozen vegetarian dishes, a dozen rice/pilaf/pasta/filo pie choices, six house specials and, when you've finished navigating this cornucopia, there are some 14 dessert offerings to salivate over. (To avoid the "endless menu" syndrome that sometimes comes with endless variety, Ouzeri has artfully compacted the entire menu onto a simple pastelled-and-watercoloured placemat-sized sheet of paper, with food on one side and wine on the other. In an elegant, simplistic way, even the menu makes an "Ouzerian" statement).

Greek style dim sum served daily

But wait – there's more. Just because you're not in Chinatown doesn't mean you can't have Dim Sum. Ouzeri offers Meze Sum (Greek Style Dim Sum) seven days a week, excluding holidays, from 11:30 a.m. to 2 p.m. Your insane urges to try everything on the menu can now be indulged with impunity. And the Meze Sum is just what you'd hope for: a mouth-watering assortment of Greek specialties, both hot and cold, ferried freshly from table to table.

All dishes are prepared from scratch with fresh ingredients, and no additives are used.

Clearly this is no ordinary Greek restaurant, and since it opened it's been a smashing success in more ways than one. Smashing plates are available – this is one restaurant that doesn't kid around about being "authentically" Greek. Adding to the authenticity are a Bouzouki player (performing Tuesdays from 10 p.m. to 2 a.m.) and two Greek dancers (Friday and Saturday evening, with their rendition of Zorba the Greek and Zebekiko).

Co-owner Lois Pickett (with chef Fotis Sotiroulis) found the spot when shopping for a restaurant location on behalf of a third party. She saw in it a special magic that her client didn't, and when he balked, she jumped. Her efforts have clearly communicated the magic to a rapt audience, making it a magnet on the Danforth. Ouzeri is a delight for both the eyes and the palate. And, if you're able to flag Pickett down and say hello, you'll be treated to a healthy dose of her down-to-earth good humour.

Ouzeri is open from 11:30 a.m. to 2 a.m. Sundays to Thursdays, until 4 a.m. Fridays and Saturdays. Reservations are accepted up until 7:30 p.m. on Fridays and 7 p.m. on Saturdays, and clients are advised to arrive early on these evenings to avoid lineups.

Saga tells a story with a deliciously happy beginning . . . and ending

Wow!

That in a nutshell describes your first impression when you set foot in Saga, the newest addition to the Danforth's lineup of fine restaurants — though, as you'll discover, this restaurant stands apart from the rest in more ways than one.

Stunning murals depict historical scenes

First, the decor — though you've come for the food, you'll be enthralled by the surroundings well before you delve into the menu.

The American Heritage Dictionary defines "saga" as a "prose narrative . . recounting historical and legendary events and exploits," and that's precisely the story this restaurant tells. Tales of Roman mythology are depicted in stunningly vivid murals against a soothing sponge-painted backdrop, and if you examine the walls more closely you'll find the story elegantly calligraphed in a certain spot. The doorframes and overhanging ledges are exacting reproductions of period Roman architecture.

The owners, not satisfied with having the walls and wall ornaments speak, decided to impart a story-telling capacity to the chairs, railings, and fixtures as well. Painstakingly handmade in wrought iron, the railing that separates the rounded L-shaped bar from the dining area resonates with Roman swords, shields, and serpents. Similarly wrought, the chairs will seat you comfortably in the Roman Empire. Even the lamps (whose muted lights create an eery old-world atmosphere) and the wall ornaments add anecdotes to the story. But the pièce de résistance is the wine rack, a winged wrought-iron chariot that looks like it might alight from the wall at any moment despite its prodigious weight. (Have no fear: it's safely ensconced behind the bar). The Saga extends all the way to the sculptured washroom doors, which would win a "Best Washroom Door" award hands down.

Wrought iron fixtures also tell a story

The owners "wanted to do something different. There was no point duplicating an existing concept, so we started from scratch, did a lot of research . . . and commissioned artists to create the look we wanted from top to bottom."

This inimitable ambience would be a tough act for any menu to follow, but Saga's kitchen succeeds admirably well under the direction of chef Amini, giving its founders reason to hope that the food will become as "legendary" as the decor.

Italian fine dining with geographic twists

Knowing full well the multiplicity of fine Greek restaurants on the Danforth, the partners decided to offer Danforth-goers what the street didn't yet have: Italian fine dining, with a few geographic twists to further distinguish it from Toronto's other fine Italian restaurants. The result is a Roman adventure replete with surprises.

For starters, try the Steamed Fresh Asparagus with roasted red peppers and toasted hazelnut vinaigrette ($5.95). Moving on to salads, there's a delicious Hearts of Lettuce offering with peach salsa and frisée ($4.95), or (in Rome, do as the Romans do) a Roman Salad with fresh tomatoes, Bocconcini cheese, red onions, and fresh basil vinaigrette ($5.50).

Saga's dining room features stunning murals, old-world lighting, wrought-iron chairs and fixtures. Note the calligraphy at right.

Pasta choices are plentiful and innovative. Recommended are the Linguine (with grilled chicken, eggplant, sundried tomato, and red onions in a cilantro ginger broth, $10.95), Farfalle (smoked chicken, roasted garlic, grilled raidichio, fresh tomato, tuscan olive oil and pesto sauce, $10.95), and, if you like it hot, the Penne Arrabiata (jalapeno peppers, garlic, black olives, and fresh basil tomato sauce, $9.95).

If you're a "legendary" eater and still have room for an entrée after running this gauntlet, the Veal Frangelico is a delicate piece of heaven (with oyster mushrooms and pistachio crust in a light Frangelico sauce, $12.50). Fowl lovers will be partial to the Capons Oven Roasted Chicken in a splendid sherry avocado citrus sauce ($10.95). If you're a lamb lover, the filet of lamb

A romantic restaurant through and through tenderloin with fresh rosemary, shallots, and barolo sauce is a savoury reminder that you're still on the Danforth.

All entrées are served with seasonal vegetables or pasta and your choice of tomato or cream sauce.

Since opening a month ago, Saga has enjoyed an "overwhelming response" from clients. Hundreds of people have come, seen — and been conquered by the decor and cuisine.

This is a romantic restaurant through and through, from its soft lighting and soothing background music to its elegant, boudoirishly curtained picture window that surveys the Danforth. The cuisine should be savoured slowly with good company.

Just when you thought you'd seen everything on the Danforth, along comes a Saga with a most interesting story to tell.

"Avli is Greek perfection .... Chef Lambrinos and his partner Sharon Mary Murray offer food that is poetry."
—Sara Waxman, Toronto Sun, June 25/95

Avli courts discerning clientele

There's a new courtyard in town and it welcomes you to its restaurant.

Shouldn't that be the other way around?

In Avli's case, it works both ways. Avli, which means courtyard, is the centre of Greek life. This is where family and friends gather for eating, drinking and celebrating. Chef Lambrinos, the "one-named culinary wizard", as Byron Ayanoglu calls him, and his partner, the vivacious food professional Sharon Murray, have transformed this Danforth storefront into a timeless feasting ground that will evoke the charming courtyards of Greek heritage, while catering to the demands of the sophisticated Toronto palate.

This is not a souvlaki house. With "so many excellent restaurants on the Danforth serving mainstream Greek cuisine," says Lambrinos, "we wanted to offer something very different which was still in the Greek realm." What you'll find are authentic dishes from Asia Minor and Aegean specialties, intermingled with flavours of the Middle East, that may redefine a few of your preconceptions about Greek cuisine. The menu, co-designed by Chef Lambrinos and the Greek-Canadian food maven Byron Ayanoglu, features main course pies with a home-made crust and zesty fillings of Greek favourites like shrimp-feta-tomato; spinach-cheese; pearl-onion stiffado; and chicken-breast-rosemary. From the grill, toothsome morsels of chicken, lamb, salmon and calamari, all with special sauces. An heirloom recipe seafood-fish casserole. And of course a slew of starters, including the fabled Greek vegetarian delicacies.

This restaurant is a vegetarian and seafood lover's paradise, and a boon to anyone favouring fresh lighter fare. Fresh herbs and spices, extra-virgin oil, organically-raised chicken, and "only the finest ingredients" are additional enticements. Avli's dessert list, which offers entirely home-made creations, ranging from a thick-crust Lebanese-style baklava to a flourless almond torte, are available in the afternoon, alongside a light menu, for coffee-tea time service reminiscent of the sidewalk cafes of Athens' Lokonaki, or indeed Vienna. This same sweet table, and an accompanying late-night menu, will also be served into the wee hours for those who like to extend their evenings past midnight.

Lambrinos' 27 years of experience at fine restaurants in Toronto, Montreal and New York have clearly been well spent, and the fruits of his present labours are well worth sampling. Because all dishes are made to order, you may have to wait a few extra minutes for them to emerge from the kitchen — but then what's a "courtyard" for if not to sit back and smell the roses?

Ellas Restaurant, Banquets and Catering

Ellas, the first Greek restaurant in Toronto, opened in November 1967. (Its name is English for "Greece".) Although it has remained in its original location, Ellas expanded five years ago to provide better facilities for a steady and growing clientele.

Along one wall of the restaurant is an open kitchen, where waiters invite guests to see the wide variety of dishes. Since Ellas opened, such open kitchens have become a common feature of Greek restaurants in Toronto. It is also possible simply to order from the menu.

There is a wide range of Greek cuisine, including a variety of traditional lamb dishes, baby goat and moussaka. Meat dishes are broiled or steamed, and made with fresh herbs. There is also a wide selection of fresh fish, all broiled. The ocean species include grouper, tuna, red snapper, sea snapper, sea bass, shrimps, scallops, calamari, octopus, saltwater salmon and trout. Two or more guests may make a combination platter with several fish or meat dishes.

Ellas uses only fresh grown (on premises) organic spices to cook with and only the best quality products. All seafood is flown in fresh daily so that Ellas can serve the best quality seafood in town.

Ellas offers spanakopita (spinach pie), and a variety of dips such as tzatziki, dolmadis, eggplant or tarama, a caviar dip. The vegetables are always fresh; so is the bread, which is baked on the premises. There are homemade desserts like baklava and custard, as well as fresh fruit and assorted pastries which are also baked on the premises.

Those who want their food to taste good and be healthful at the same time will enjoy Ellas. Cholesterol-free oil is used in cooking, and olive oil in the salads. Nothing is deep-fried. Tests show that Ellas' moussaka has only 350 calories, or one-third the normal calorie count for moussaka. The lamb fricassee has only 250, also only one-third the normal count.

The decor is neo-classical, with murals, reliefs and replicas of statues from classical Greek history. The colors are pastel and light earth tones, creamy white and mint green on the railings. There is plenty of gold leaf, all of it 24-carat gold.

Ellas, which has "class" but is not too expensive, is the ideal place to invite special guests. In addition to bouzouki and guitar music and singing, you can enjoy dancing and entertainment in a special room upstairs set aside for this purpose. Almost any size of party or banquet can be accommodated, from an intimate gathering of five or ten up to 1,000 people.

Ellas is at 702 Pape Ave., just north of Danforth on the west side, south of the parking lot opposite Pape subway.

Plum posting irks envoys

Scene in Ottawa

By RICHARD CLEROUX

OTTAWA — The career diplomats at Foreign Affairs are in a snit over former Liberal MP David Berger's appointment as ambassador to Israel, replacing Norman Spector, who is coming home.

To them, a plum diplomatic posting such as Tel Aviv should have gone to a career diplomat much like themselves, rather than to a political appointee like Berger. The morning suits at Foreign Affairs can be very cruel when the big jobs are being handed out to somebody else.

On the surface, the Berger posting appears no worse than the Spector appointment three years ago, when former prime minister Brian Mulroney, casting about for a place for his suddenly-expendable chief of staff after the Meech Lake and Charlottetown disasters, struck upon the notion of sending Spector, a Jew, to Tel Aviv. Not much difference, unless you conveniently forget that Spector was once a respected public servant in British Columbia, long before he became a chief of staff for Mulroney.

Spector becomes the new president of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency (ACOA), where he'll find himself up against Public Works Minister David Dingwall. If that wasn't enough, the appointment specifies that Spector, a bachelor from Montreal who is used to the good life in Ottawa and Vancouver, must "become resident in Atlantic Canada," proving that somebody in Chrétien's office really doesn't like Spector. Even Gaza might not look so bad after a while.

On Dec. 28, 1994, Berger relinquished his seat in St. Henri-Westmount, a riding he had held for the past 16 years, to allow the Liberals to run their new Quebec political star, Lucienne Robillard, a former provincial Liberal cabinet minister, to juice up the federalist benches in Ottawa in preparation for the big Quebec referendum on separation this fall. The ploy worked.

Predictably, former Liberal MP Ian Watson, speaking for the National Council on Canada-Arab Relations, said Berger was too pro-Israel to represent Canada in such a politically sensitive area as the Middle East.

By Watson's reasoning, our next diplomatic appointment to Saudi Arabia should not be too pro-Arab. Too bad. That might leave Watson off the short list.

Back to Berger, a modest man, an MP who, during 16 years on Parliament Hill, cut a barely discernible swath. Berger is remembered — apart from looking after his riding — for speaking out frequently on behalf of small business — even before it became fashionable — and for promoting industry and exports.

Berger realized last year that since he has never been a Chrétien confidant and will likely never be, his political career had gone just about as far as it ever would. His chances of making cabinet were considered zilch. So when the Tel Aviv offer was made, he jumped at it.

Doesn't get any better

It's not as if he needed the money. Berger is the son of the late real estate millionaire Sam Berger, who once owned the Montreal Alouette football club and before that the Ottawa Roughrider football club, as well as a good chunk of geography in Ottawa. As a former MP, Berger will have a pension of $48,000 a year on top of whatever he earns after his diplomatic service.

The real reason he accepted the post was emotional. Berger is Jewish and for someone Jewish to be going to Israel, especially as ambassador from Canada, is not an insignificant honor.

It's sort of like when labor leader Michael McDermott was appointed ambassador to Ireland. He cried all the way to Dublin, it was said. In emotive terms, it just doesn't get any better.

Before Spector, no Jew had ever been appointed Canadian ambassador to Israel. Berger will be the second. A nice tradition has begun.

David Berger

What is needed now to reflect our cultural diversity is for Canada to post an Arab-Canadian as ambassador to an Arab country.

Berger prepared for his appointment by taking a three-week course at Foreign Affairs last month, learning how to become an ambassador — everything from embassy administration to diplomatic protocol to security tricks on how to frustrate nasty terrorists.

"I'm going to give it my level best," says Berger, sounding for all the world like a Boy Scout. "This is an important responsibility. I want to do a good job. Mr. Chrétien appointed me because he thought I would represent Canada well."

Tel Aviv is a major embassy. A staff of 50 includes a full complement of trade, consular, immigration, military and commercial attaches. Rumor has it there may even be a CSIS agent (at least one). Berger even gets to be High Commissioner to Cyprus in the bargain.

He plans to make trade promotion a big part of his agenda and hopes to use donations from Canadian firms operating in Israel to throw the biggest Canada Day party Tel Aviv has ever seen next July 1.

True to his likeable nature, Berger has already made moves likely to endear him to the Israelis. Unlike other diplomats who send their children to the American School or the French Lycee, Berger and his wife Monica have decided to send their children, Philippe, Laura and Sarah, to a local Israeli school where Hebrew will be the language of education.

The transition to an Israeli school should be easier because Berger had the good sense to send his children for the past few years to the Star of David Hebrew school in Ottawa. The Hebrew lessons of principal Hennie Honigman and her able teaching staff will not have been wasted.

Compensation sought for seized Polish property

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — McGill University law professor Irwin Cotler has taken up the cause of an elderly couple campaigning to receive compensation for property in Poland confiscated by the Nazis.

The Polish-born couple's quest is attracting the attention of a growing number of Holocaust survivors also seeking idemnity from former Communist regimes in Eastern Europe, which nationalized the land in question.

Cotler says he will put the case of Paris-based Ewa Szpicberg, who inherited two apartment blocks in the Polish city of Gdansk in 1931, on the agenda of the World Jurists Association conference to be held in Montreal August 12 to 17.

This month, Cotler raised the issue with the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists at its meeting in Tel Aviv.

Cotler intends to make Szpicberg's cause a priority of Inter-Amicus, the McGill-based international human rights centre he heads, and he has written to the leaders of the G-7 countries.

Cotler said the case is "a matter of international human rights of the highest priority [and] a saga of scandalous dispossession and exploitation."

Szpicberg, 72, and her husband Michel Brochetain, 77, now French citizens, have been seeking compensation since 1992, when they read in Newsweek that an official in Krakow had said Jews should be indemnified for seized property.

Szpicberg is demanding compensation from: the city of Gdansk; Orbis, the Polish state tourist organization that has a hotel on the land she lost; and Saur Neptun Gdansk, a French-Polish joint venture which operates a water treatment project on one of the sites.

The couple were successful in persuading the European Bank for Reconstruction and Development to suspend its $88.4 million (US) backing because of the claim.

But neither the Polish authorities nor the French investors have offered to listen to their compensation claim.

The two lots were bought by Szpicberg's father in 1922 in what was then called Danzig. The land was seized from the family by the Germans under the Nuremberg laws in 1939.

Today, Orbis has a perpetual lease on one property from the provincial government, while the other is owned by the city and houses the local waterworks, which is managed jointly by the French company Saur, a wholly-owned subsidiary of Bouygues, a large construction and engineering firm, and the city of Gdansk.

In a letter last month to company executive Martin Bouygues, Cotler wrote: "By refusing to compensate [Szpicberg], the Polish authorities and the French corporations are effectively accessories to a Nuremberg war crime perpetrated by the Nazis, and you are jointly and severally responsible with the Polish authorities for this human rights violation of great historical consequence."

Irwin Cotler

Because Bouygues is incorporated under the laws of France, Cotler holds that the French goverment is also "morally and legally obliged" to ensure that the corporation complies with "principles of international human rights law respecting accountability and restitution for war crimes."

Although Poland has no law on the restoration of private property confiscated during the Nazi occupation, Poland does feel an obligation toward people like Szpicberg and others who had real estate nationalized by the communists, said Michal Zawila, first secretary and consul at the Polish embassy.

He said the parliament is expected to consider several draft bills this fall, but admitted he did not know the details of the proposals. The consensus appears to be that all Poles — Jewish or not — should be compensated. At least one proposal would limit indemnity to those still living in Poland.

Zawila noted that Polish Foreign Minister Wladyslaw Bartoszewsky was recently in Israel, where he discussed the particular concerns of Jews whose property was confiscated initially by the Nazis.

Polish Ambassador Tadeusz Diem has also met with a Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) delegation to explore the issue.

Zawila said it would probably be impractical to return title to land that had been nationalized before the communist era.

CJC executive director Jack Silverstone, who was not aware of the Szpicberg case, described claims by dispossessed Jews from the former East Bloc, as an "emerging issue."

"Certainly, they have a compelling moral case," he said, adding CJC recognizes the problem Poland faces in opening itself up to "billions of dollars worth of claims."

CJC has had talks with Polish Canadian Congress, he said.

Gur led troops to Western Wall

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — Israel reacted with shock and sorrow at last weekend's suicide of Mordechai ("Motta") Gur, Israel's deputy defence minister and liberator of Jerusalem.

Last Sunday's cabinet meeting opened with a moment of silence in Gur's memory.

With tears in his eyes, Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin gave an uncharacteristically emotional eulogy for Gur, who was Rabin's comrade-in-arms and close political ally for almost half a century.

"Motta was a special person, sensitive and strong, a soldier and a civilian, a lover of books and of writing, and above all, a friend," Rabin said. "You knew at all times that he was with you and at your side. May his memory be blessed."

Gur, 65, committed suicide after years of fighting cancer. A gun was found next to his body. He had a single bullet wound to the head.

He left a note saying he no longer wanted to be a burden to his family.

A retired lieutenant-general, Gur commanded the Israeli paratroop unit that liberated eastern Jerusalem during the 1967 Six Day War.

He personally headed the force that entered the Old City and reached the Western Wall and Temple Mount.

News of Gur's death dominated the Israeli media last Sunday, pushing aside stories about peace negotiations with the Palestinians and Syrians.

Throughout the day, Israeli radio stations broadcast the historic words Gur uttered on the third day of the Six Day War:

"The Temple Mount is in our hands. Repeat: the Temple Mount is in our hands. And now the entire Old City is in our hands, and we are very, very happy."

Civil strife feared

It specifically puts into question the role of the army's hesder units in which soldiers combine yeshivah studies with military service. Three of the rabbis behind the ruling are themselves heads of hesder yeshivot – a fact which has prompted calls to disband these units.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin called the rabbinical decision grave, unprecedented and inconceivable and warned that it could turn Israel "into a banana republic." But he rejected calls to disband the hesder units, maintaining that it is premature to question their loyalty.

President Ezer Weizman said the ruling "undermines the basic principles on which the IDF is based and could invalidate the democratic foundation of the state."

Both coalition and opposition parties were united in denouncing the rabbis' decision.

Other accused the rabbis of couching politics in halachah (Jewish religious law). "There is no halachic basis for a ruling that instructs a soldier to refuse to obey orders in this case," said Rabbi Yehuda Amital, head of the hesder Yeshivah Har Etzion in Gush Etzion, adding that the ruling was politically motivated.

Former Chief Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, spiritual leader of the Shas party, also rejected the ruling, arguing that if rabbis decide to let their students serve in the army, they have to accept the nature of the army.

The army refrained from issuing an official reaction. But the commander of the IDF officers' training school, Col. Elazer Stern, a yeshivah graduate himself, warned that disobeying orders would lead not only to the destruction of the army, but to the destruction of the state.

Jennie was 17 when she and her sister Mary left Sosnowiec, Poland, in 1926 for Canada. They left their parents, Joel and Ruchel Diament, four sisters and many other relatives. For a year they stayed in Montreal with an aunt and then came to Toronto to live with their aunt and uncle, Ruchel and Koppel Abrams. In Toronto, Jennie married Isaac (Lipshitz) Lipson, an immigrant from Mlawa, Poland.

The child in the front page photograph with Jennie is her 3½-year-old daughter, Edith (now Edith Friedman) of Toronto. The photos sent to Jennie's parents were taken in Bronte (just west of Toronto) and on Grace Street in Toronto.

Lipson's son, Dr. Martin Lipson, a family physician, called The CJN to identify the photos. He explained that on Sept. 9, 1939, the Germans entered Sosnowiec. The Jews were rounded up in 1942 and his mother never knew where her parents had perished.

"The photographs found at Auschwitz are the first objective verification that my grandparents met their end in Auschwitz," Martin told The CJN.

Another call to The CJN identified the young woman and 4½-year-old child in two other photographs sent by Jennie to her parents. On a visit to Toronto this week, Dr. Jack Kraicer, who was a professor at the University of Western Ontario and at Queens University before taking a position in France two years ago as Director of Research Grants for the Human Frontier Science Program, saw the article and identified himself and his mother, Ange Kraicer.

Ange, whose family lived in Dobrawa, Poland, near Sosnowiec, was a friend of Jennie's in Poland and they remained close after Ange came to Canada in 1930.

• Hezbollah fired 27 katyusha rockets at civilian targets in the Galilee. The rocket barrage was the third such attack in less than one month. Hezbollah claimed the attack was in retaliation for the shelling of Nabatiyeh by Israel in which two young girls died. Israel acknowledged that the girls died as a result of a terrible mistake by its forces.

July 11:

• Ha'aretz reported that Israel's balance of trade deficit had improved substantially in the last four months. The export of all goods had risen by 14 per cent between March and June as compared to a decrease by six per cent in the previous four months. The Bank of Israel reports the economy continues to improve with exceptional increases in the housing, trade and hotel sectors.

July 12:

• A report appeared in the media that the Moslem underground in Kashmir, India is planning to kidnap Israeli tourists. The source of the information is an American tourist, who along with three fellow travelers, was abducted in Kashmir by members of the underground. The others are still being held captive.

July 13:

• A spate of ugly road accidents claimed three lives, all of them children, in the past 48 hours. Scores of individuals, most of them children, were injured.

• Davar reported that construction of bypass roads in the West Bank is the main problem which could disturb the implementation of the interim agreement with the Palestinians.

• According to Davar, the Cabinet was told the IDF will not redeploy until the bypass roads are completed. The paper also reported that Hamas is negotiating with the PLO about its participation in the election for membership for the Palestinian Council, but that the PLO is demanding Hamas halt attacks against Israel as a a precondition for participation.

July 14 :

• U.S. Special Middle East envoy Dennis Ross left the region disappointed that he had been unable to get Israel and Syria to agree to send senior military experts to Washington for follow-up discussions on security arrangements. Ross said the sides disagree on both substantive and format issues.

Canada Park singed in Israeli forest fire

Jewish Telegraphic Agency and CJN Staff

Israeli firefighters stamp out blaze. [RNS photo]

NEW YORK — The Jewish National Fund (JNF), responsible for planting most of the two million trees and 6,000 acres of forested land burned this month in Israel's worst forest fire, has vowed to rehabilitate the charred areas.

Last week, JNF and government workers were clearing away charred trees. As well, Environment Minister Yossi Sarid struck a special committee headed by Dr. Michael Sachs, director of JNF's afforestation division.

The fire burnt "fringe areas" of Canada Park, a JNF grove along the Tel Aviv-Jerusalem highway, but the park was left mainly untouched, said Ben Prossin of JNF Canada's Toronto office.

"Israel is in mourning, but we will rebuild," JNF world chairman Moshe Rivlin vowed in the aftermath of the fire, which burnt for 20 hours.

The blaze left at least 30 families homeless in the settlements of Neve Israel and Shoresh. It caused an estimated $30 million in property damage and $27 million in damage to forests.

The fire, whose origin has been determined to be accidental, started near a moshav bordering the Jerusalem highway and was aided by intense heat followed by unusually strong gales of wind.

An inquiry conducted by Jerusalem police last week officially ruled out arson.

The flames, which reached heights of 15 metres, torched the highly flammable Jerusalem Pines, destroying dozens of homes and wiping out the region's wildlife.

Several communities, including Shoresh, Telstone, Shoeva, Yad Hashmona and Neve Ilan had to be evacuated. Forty-four people were hospitalized with minor injuries, mostly from smoke inhalation.

JNF leaders said they believe damage could have been more tragic and extensive without the recent incorporation of sophisticated fire prevention technology.

During the peak of the Palestinian uprising, when arson was used as a terrorist tool, Forest Service officials with the United States Department of Agriculture recommended several steps to fight forest fires.

JNF officials said they implemented several of the recommendations, including the creation of fire roads and observation towers. Also, four-wheel drive fire trucks able to navigate steep terrains and carry large supplies of water were purchased.

Officials said JNF will spare no cost in repairing the forest.

Russian anti-Semitism growing

CJN Wire Services

MOSCOW — A new study by a University of Toronto sociologist has found disturbing increases in Russian anti-Semitism.

Prof. Robert Brym commissioned a survey of 2,000 Russian adults in 42 cities and 24 villages across the country this year. The study found that anti-Semitism has spread to virtually all segments of Russian society.

One-third of the respondents said they wouldn't want a close relative to marry a Jew and 16 per cent believe Russia may be the victim of a Zionist plot.

Brym estimates that between 10 and 16 per cent of Russians can be classified as "extreme anti-Semites" — a rate triple that of North America.

Brym attributes the numbers to the dissolution of the old Soviet Union and the ensuing breakdown in social and economic order.

Anti-Semitism remains a "potential threat" to Russia's 1.5 million Jews — enough of a threat to encourage their emigration, Brym said last week.

JUDY DAN

Of Blessed Memory

The worldwide Boys Town Jerusalem family mourns with profound sorrow the sudden and untimely passing of Mrs. Judy Dan, devoted wife of our esteemed Board Member and cherished friend, Mr. Leslie Dan.

Mrs. Dan, of blessed memory, together with her partner in life and philanthropy, Mr. Leslie Dan, have benefacted countless Jewish and humanitarian causes, both locally, abroad and in Israel. They have invigorated and enriched Jewish communal life in Canada with their active participation and involvement. Their magnanimous support for Eretz Yisroel, Am Yisroel and Toras Yisroel is most inspirational and provides a lasting legacy for the Jewish people. The Harry and Lillian Henteleff Computer Science Laboratory at Boys Town Jerusalem, dedicated in loving memory of Mrs. Dan's parents, will enable Boys Town's more than 1,000 students to acquire the education and skills they need to emerge as the future leaders and builders of Israel.

We extend heartfelt condolences to Mr. Leslie Dan and the entire family. May they be comforted together with the mourners of Zion and Jerusalem.

Netanyahu goes online

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Benjamin Netanyahu, leader of Israel's Likud opposition, has boldly gone where no other Israeli politician has gone before: bypassing media gatekeepers to speak directly to John Q. Public via the Internet.

Netanyahu went online last week as a featured guest of the Israel Forum of the CompuServe international computer network.

He fielded questions from computer users worldwide with access to the service, and while the electronic town hall meeting was innovative, the results must have been disappointing.

Only about 120 computers were logged on to the Forum at any one time (it started at 10:30 p.m. EDT) and Netanyahu's stock replies to burning questions shed little light on the current Mideast situation.

Further enfeebling the proceedings was the tedium in waiting for Netanyahu's responses, which were typed into the system in real time. In other words, participants waited at their screens as someone in Israel — Netanyahu himself? — typed the Likud leader's views into the system, letter by letter. Hardly the stuff to stir the kishkes.

The proceedings were interrupted on several occasions due to technical glitches and to give Netanyahu a chance to respond to questions from Israel Radio and television interviewers in Israel.

In the dead time caused by these disruptions, participants were asked to vote in a straw poll on questions like: Do you think Jerusalem's status as capital of Israel is in danger?

The Israel Forum, a service offered by CompuServe, is devoted to communication and information about Jewish topics and Israel.

It opened in March 1995 and has more than 12,000 subscribers worldwide. In terms of traffic, it ranks 100th out of 1,100 forums on CompuServe.

And as to the question about Jerusalem, 61 respondents thought Jerusalem's status as Israel's capital was in danger, 58 did not.

Sarajevo centre hit

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

SARAJEVO — For the first time in the 3-year-old war in Bosnia, the Jewish community's headquarters in Sarajevo has taken a direct hit.

A 120 mm mortar shell hit the Jewish community centre in the Bosnian capital last Monday afternoon.

According to Jacob Finci, president of La Benevolencija, the Jewish community's non-sectarian aid agency, no one was hurt.

"The shell hit the top floor and destroyed an unused room. Since it was after our regular lunch-time, almost no one was in the building," he said.

Finci said he and Ivan Ceresnjes, community president, received telephone calls from both the Bosnian Serbs and the Bosnian government.

Each blamed the other side for the attack.

Finci, who maintains a strictly apolitical stance in the ongoing conflict between the Bosnian government and rebel Serbs, refused to speculate on which group was responsible for the assault.

"We're still feeding people every day, whether they are Jews, Croats, Serbs or Muslims," he said.

But because of recent heavy shelling, less than half of the 320 daily visitors to La Benevolencija's soup kitchen have come there during the past month.

And with all access routes into Sarajevo blocked and nearly 100 tons of food waiting in rented warehouses outside the city, La Benevolencija no longer has food packages to give out.

Rabbinical student shifts gears to fix bikes

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Yossi Sapirman leads a double life. He's the spiritual leader of the Danforth Shul and he's also the owner of Yossi's Bike Repair.

Sapirman, 26, spends mornings studying for smicha (rabbinic ordination), while devoting afternoons and evenings to his bicycle repair business which has grown 100 per cent a year in its three years of operation.

'It's a hectic life. I run up to Richmond Hill for smicha study with my father (Rabbi Dovid Sapirman) and then I rush back here," he said.

His shop in the Lawrence and Bathurst area is filled with bicycles of every size, shape and color, but it's immaculate — every tool has its place.

He said he had taken a bicycle mechanics course, fixing bikes for family and friends for fun, but decided to turn his hobby into a business after hearing many youngsters at an Orthodox boy's school complain about shoddy repairs on their bikes.

"I felt there was a need for a reliable bicycle repair shop in the community," he said. But he did not want to limit the operation to his immediate comunity and added a unique service: free pick up and delivery, and on-the-spot repair for flat tires anywhere in Metro Toronto.

He said the pick-up and delivery service was "the way to go" because he felt such a convenience would meet consumers' needs. "It's hard to get a bike into a car. Bikes are big and dirty and people don't like to schlep them."

Sapirman said he runs a warehouse rather than a store-front operation to keep his prices competitive. He said he can afford the free pick-up and delivery and quick service because he doesn't have to pay the high rent for retail space.

Buying new bikes for every child can be expensive for large families, he said, and kids can be hard on bikes. He sells reconditioned bikes "as a service to customers."

He also advises parents not to buy multi-speed bikes for younger children because "the more sophisticated the bike the more there will be to go wrong."

He said there are many parallels between bike and car maintenance. "Cheaper bikes, like cheaper cars, break down more easily, but the parts are cheaper. Expensive bikes, like expensive cars, don't break down as often, but they're more expensive to fix."

Bicycles require regular tune-ups to prevent wear and tear on parts, but yearly tune-ups are also mandatory for safety, he said. "We've had bikes in here unsafe to ride and the parents didn't even realize how dangerous it was."

When it comes to safety, the rabbinic side dominates Sapirman's persona. He is so committed to promoting safety that he offers free bicycle safety tips on his business line, as a public service.

Sapirman said the public needs to develop more awareness about bicycle safety. "A bike is a sophisticated piece of machinery with 300 components. Anything can go wrong. And there are no seats belts or air bags."

Travel Talk

by Bill Gladstone

TORONTO — On his first visit to Canada, the director-general of Israel's Ministry of Tourism expressed optimism that increased tourism in Israel and the Middle East will spur economic development and benefit the entire region.

"Tourism is connected to the peace process and it's very sensitive to the security situation," said Eli Gonen. "We're confident that the growth of tourism will contribute to the economic situation of each country in the region, and that in turn will strengthen peace initiatives. It's a circle that reinforces itself."

At a press breakfast in the offices of the Israel Government Tourist Office in Toronto, Gonen cited a projection of the World Tourism Organization that travel to the Middle East will increase by 235 per cent over the next five years. The first five months of 1995 have already shown a 15 per cent increase in tourism to Israel over the same period in 1994, he said.

"We're pleased and proud that the tourism industry is the first to lead all other [sectors] in this new era," he said.

Citing the peace agreements and open borders between Israel and two of its Arab neighbors, Egypt and Jordan, Gonen said the three countries were working together to promote the Middle East as a single package for visitors.

"I hope that the Palestinians will establish their organization and develop their facilities and be part of the group that promotes the Middle East region," he said.

The Palestinians "have had to develop an organization for tourism from square one," he said.

Air Canada's new twice-weekly direct flights from Toronto to Tel Aviv should bring both countries increased tourism dollars, he said, noting that each year, one in five of Israel's five million citizens travels outside the country.

"We really believe that Israel and the Middle East are going to be the best and most attractive destinations of the future, and we hope Air Canada will do a good business," he said.

While in Toronto, Gonen presented the Shalom Tourism Award to Canadian Industry Minister John Manley in recognition of his work in promoting Canada-Israel ties. Manley, the minister responsible for tourism, is a "true friend of Israel whose goal is to strengthen Canadian connections with Israel in every way," Gonen said.

Swiss banks loosen grip on depositors' money

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

TEL AVIV — Swiss banks are taking steps to resolve the issue of bank deposits of Holocaust victims.

Top officials of Switzerland's major banks have reached an agreement to appoint an independent arbitrator to oversee the transfer of the deposits to their rightful heirs, according to the current issue of The Jerusalem Report. The banks will reportedly issue an official announcement in the near future.

Media in Israel and elsewhere have reported that large amounts of money belonging to victims of the Holocaust are still being held in Swiss bank accounts.

So far, Swiss banks have refused to release the deposits to relatives of the deceased without proper documentation and accurate account numbers, much of which vanished during and after the war years.

Estimates of these accounts, deposited during World War II, range from tens of millions of dollars to nearly $7 billion.

But the Swiss Bankers Association, the industry's leading organization, said the estimates are highly inflated.

"Recent numbers named by various parties in the press in reference to the amount of unclaimed assets from the Nazi era are massively exaggerated," the organization said in a statement.

In the past, Swiss banks strongly opposed the appointment of an independent arbitrator to mediate between the banks and relatives of Holocaust victims.

The banks had argued that attempts to help relatives provide documentation would violate the strict secrecy laws that have become the hallmark of the Swiss banking system.

But reacting to persistent media attention to the issue, members of the Swiss Bankers Association met at the beginning of July to discuss the matter and the damage it caused to their image.

According to Hans Baer, a Jewish banker and the director-general of the Swiss bank Julius Baer and Co., the banks agreed unanimously that an independent arbitrator should be appointed to mediate the claims.

Baer admitted that lists made in the 1960s of such accounts were incomplete. But he denied allegations that the banks stole money belonging to Jews.

"The money is just lying in the banks," Baer said.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

Canadian Film Screened in Israel: Ms. Conceptions, the quirky documentary on single mothers by choice, produced by Toronto-based Good Soup Productions Inc., was screened twice at the Jerusalem International Film Festival earlier this month.

Directed by Ric Esther Bienstock and co-produced by Bienstock and Linda Frum, the film premiered in Canada on CBC-TV's Witness series last winter, garnering high ratings. Bienstock, who took the film to Jerusalem, had just returned from a gruelling five-week shoot in Zaire, where she was directing a follow-up film to the award-winning documentary on the deadly Ebola virus, The Plague Monkeys.

Choral Festival: Some 100 singers from more than 30 countries are set to perform in the Toronto premiere of the World Youth Choir on July 21. The concert features an eclectic mix of gospel, spiritual, traditional and contemporary music, including Canadian composer Harry Freedman's composition Pastorale. The concert is part of a live broadcast of The Arts Tonight, beginning at 6:30 p.m. with pre-concert festivities hosted by Shelaugh Rogers and special guest Ben Heppner, followed by the concert at 7:30 p.m. Both events take place in the Barbara Frum Atrium of the CBC Centre, 250 Front St. W. Tickets are $15 for adults. Phone: 416-205-5555.

Seder Plate Competition: The Spertus Museum of Chicago has announced a call for entries of designs to its second biennial Judaica Prize Competition. The ceremonial object for this year's competition is the Passover seder plate. The winner of the juried competition will receive a $10,000 prize. Deadline for entries is Jan. 15, 1996. Address inquiries to Spertus Museum, 618 S. Michigan Ave., Chicago, Illinois 60605. Phone 312-322.1747; fax 312-922-3934.

Beauty and The Beast: Eye On Arts recently attended an afternoon tea party staged by the Mirvish organization in the lobby of the posh King Street West theatre, the Princess of Wales. Alas, neither David nor his father "Honest" Ed Mirvish was in attendance. The latter, at least, was in London, England, to attend the opening of a production of The Importance of Being Ernest at the Mirvish-owned Old Vic Theatre, marking the 100th anniversary of Oscar Wilde's historic play.

As for Beauty and The Beast, the elaborate stage has been under construction for weeks. Guests of the promotional tea party were shown around the beast's castle and shown various scenic elements and props hanging in the wings. More than 30 48-foot tractor trailors were required to deliver the scenery and equipment for the Disney musical, one of the largest theatrical productions, physically speaking, ever to be mounted in Toronto.

Previews for Beauty and The Beast begin July 25, and opening night is August 8. For tickets, call TicketKing, 416-872-1212.

New Life at Harbourfront: Recently resuscitated from near-death through an infusion of federal funds that had been temporarily cut off, Toronto's Harbourfront is returning to glowing health as a major centre of the arts. Witness the recently concluded Ashkenaz New Yiddish Festival, a vibrant celebration of klezmer music and Yiddishkeit that attracted crowds earlier this month. Let's hope organizers still have enough energy to stage it again next summer.

Harbourfront Centre has announced its upcoming season of contemporary dance, which gets off to a rousing start with Batsheva, the excitingly physical company from Israel that wowed Toronto audiences four seasons ago. Because of an extended showing of the cultural exhibit Today's Japan at Harbourfront's Premier Dance Theatre, Batsheva is set to perform at the Bluma Appel Theatre in the St. Lawrence Centre.

Other performers on the roster include SOAP Dance Theatre Frankfurt, L'Esquisse from France, O Vertigo Danse, Ballet British Columbia, the David Dorfman Dance and the Danny Grossman Dance Company. For tickets, call 416-973-4000.

Full moon vampire

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "One out of two isn't bad," says Dracula when his female quarry declares: "You may drink my blood but you'll never get my soul."

This is the kind of fun playwright Allan Stratton has in his adaptation of Dracula, the novel by Bram Stoker, which is running at Skylight Theatre in Earl Bales Park until Aug. 6.

It doesn't work on every level, but Dracula is a good night out if the moon is riding high and you are taking children who like a good scare or are old enough to appreciate a send-up of the wicked count from Transylvania who invades the quiet English countryside.

Actor Geza Kovacs is dead on with his timing in the tongue-in-cheek approach to Count Dracula and he shares the honors with Martin Julien who plays both a deranged disciple of the count and a British nanny. In the latter role, the nanny says to a prim Victorian wife: "We all have dreams--then we meet our husbands."

Dear Jesse,
I am very concerned about my father. He and my mother were married for close to 60 years. When my mother died last year, my father indicated that he did not want to move from their home. He misses her terribly. I have tried to convince him to move into a residence but he is intent on doing things his way. He will not even discuss his plans with me.

R.G.

Dear R.G.,
Do not be insulted if your father does not confide completely in you about his concerns or his emotional pain. Sometimes people feel more comfortable discussing these issues with peers; for example, with friends who have been widowed or in a peer support group milieu.

Your father's desire to do things his way is a clear indication of his need to remain in control of his life. Respecting his wishes i the key to helping him maintain his independence and dignity.

Remember grief knows no schedule. There is no quick fix for moving on with one's life after the death of a loved one. The grief process must be respected and dealt with one step at a time. Meanwhile be patient and continue your supportive involvement.

You might check your local family service agency or community health centre for a support group for widowed seniors in your father's area, but if he does not feel ready for a group yet, keep the number handy for future reference. Participants in a support group have the opportunity to share concerns, reduce isolation and explore community resources in a non-judgmental, supportive atmosphere.

Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly in Montreal.

Terror strikes in Ramat Gan

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV — At least six Israelis were killed and 33 injured when a suicide bomber blew himself up on a bus in the Tel Aviv suburb of Ramat Gan on Monday morning.

Hamas claimed responsibility for the explosion, which went off during rush hour at a busy junction next to the Israel Diamond Exchange.

The bombing occurred a few days after the murder of two Israeli hikers near Jerusalem and marks the end of a three-month hiatus in terror attacks on Israelis. The incident brought back the grim scenes of the October suicide bombing of a Dizengoff Street bus, in which 22 were killed, and the January suicide attack at the Beit Lid junction that left 21 dead.

Witnesses at Monday's explosion described a deafening blast, a bus in flames and body parts flying in all directions. Within minutes, ambulances were evacuating the wounded, while police scoured the area for additional explosives.

The attack came one day before the July 25 deadline set by Palestinian and Israeli negotiators for reaching an agreement on expansion of Palestinian autonomy in the West Bank. Earlier this week, negotiators said they were unlikely to settle their differences by the target date.

The bombing prompted renewed calls by the opposition to suspend the talks and President Ezer Weizman urged the government to rethink its policy.

But Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin rejected these calls, saying that stopping the negotiations would only reward the perpetrators of the act. He said the talks would be suspended for only a few days during the period in which the funerals of the victims are held.

"We will not allow the murderers ... to achieve their goal of suspending the peace talks ... We are firm in our resolve to continue talking to those who do not commit acts of terror ... and who are taking part in the war against terror," said Rabin.

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres said, "there is no guarantee that stopping negotiations will stop terror. On the contrary, the danger will increase."

But Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu, submitting one of five motions of no-confidence, accused the government of "supporting terror instead of putting an end to it." He called for "action instead of illusion" and demanded " a different policy and a different government that will protect the lives of Jews."

Right-wing Tsomet leader Rafael Eitan called for new elections and asked to meet with the president to discuss the establishment of "an emergency national unity government."

Meanwhile, angry crowds tried to attack Police Minister Moshe Shahal and Chief of Staff Amnon Shahak at the site of the bombing on Monday.

Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat condemned the bombing, calling it "a terrorist act intended to sabotage the peace process."

Rabin announced that the closure imposed on the West Bank and Gaza Strip in the wake of the attack would not be a long-lasting one.

Alan Rose eulogized

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Alan Rose, former executive vice-president of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and one of world Jewry's most respected ambassadors-at-large, was remembered at his funeral for his integrity, tolerance and wisdom.

Over 500 persons, more than the capacity of the Spanish and Portuguese synagogue, came to bid farewell to Rose, who died July 18 at age 74.

Rose, who had retired from Congress in August 1994 to accept an appointment to the federal Immigration and Refugee Board, died after suffering from a brain tumor for several months.

Life along the Green Line

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

KFAR SABA — No place seems as far removed from the Arab-Israeli conflict as Kfar Saba, a quiet middle class town of shopping malls and café-lined boulevards in the Sharon Valley.

But some residents, like shopkeeper Ester Levy, fear that this bedroom community of Tel Aviv may soon be transformed into a Lebanese-style battleground.

That's because Kfar Saba is a five-minute walk from Kalkilya, one of six Arab cities in the West Bank that are to come under Palestinian self-rule with the implementation of Phase 2 of the Oslo accord.

The imminent withdrawal of the Israeli army from these cities and the arrival of Palestinian police in their place has residents of Kfar Saba worried.

Not everyone is as worried as Levy, but for the first time since the signing of the Oslo accord, Israelis living in the centre of the country realize that, for better or worse, the peace process is about to have a direct effect on them.

The majority fear the change will be for the worse, with 64 per cent anticipating a deterioration in their personal safety, according to a Dahaf poll published in the Hebrew newspaper Yediot Aharonot.

"The peace process is no longer something happening far off in the Gaza Strip," says Ariella Pinchus of Kfar Saba. "It's here – five minutes away from my home."

The next phase of the Oslo accord will bring self-rule to Arab cities that are minutes away from Kfar Saba, as well as dozens of other Israeli communities straddling the 1967 Green Line.

Jews living east of that line, on settlements throughout the West Bank, are uniformly opposed to the scheme – and many have vowed to resort to civil disobedience to prevent it.

But Jews living west of that line – in pre-1967 Israel – are, for the most part, ambivalent. Many are Labor party supporters who backed the Oslo accord. Now they face the true test: Are they ready to live within walking distance of a Palestinian state-in-formation?

The News In Brief Everywhere

CANADA

Hadassah Won't Go

VANCOUVER — Canadian Hadassah-WIZO won't send delegates to the United Nations' world conference on women outside Beijing in September.

National president Judy Mandleman said no press coverage of the conference will be permitted, and the idea of a woman's rights conference in a country where women have few rights doesn't make sense.

She said a number of members have signed up to attend but the national executive decided against sending participants.

Ottawa BGU President

OTTAWA — Harry Prizant, an optometrist, has been appointed president of the Ottawa chapter of the Canadian Associates of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev. He succeeds Susannah Dalfen, president for the past seven years.

Jewish Lawyers' Parley

TORONTO — About 200 Canadians will join colleagues from 35 countries at the 10th congress of the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists, to take place in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv Dec. 26 to Jan. 1.

The congress will include a model trial presided over by the president of Israel's Supreme Court, Meir Shamgar, and four other leading international jurists, including Ontario Chief Justice Charles Dubin.

ISRAEL

New Cabinet Ministers

JERUSALEM — The Knesset last week approved two new cabinet ministers.

Former deputy foreign minister Yossi Beilin is the new minister of economic affairs and planning. The post was vacated when religious affairs minister Shimon Shetreet relinquished the job.

Former Israel Defence Force (IDF) Chief of Staff Ehud Barak will head the Interior Ministry, replacing David Libai, who will continue as justice minister.

Airmen Missing

JERUSALEM — Two Israel Air Force officers were missing and presumed lost last week after their F-16 fighter plane collided with another F-16 off the coast of Nahariya early Tuesday morning.

The airmen failed to eject from their plane after the collision.

Concertgoers Crushed

JERUSALEM — Two young music fans, one a tourist from Los Angeles, were killed and hundreds injured at the Arad music festival last Tuesday night, when the gates to the event collapsed, crushing hundreds of youngsters.

Organizers closed the annual festival. Officials said some 21,000 fans had gathered at a venue built for 17,000.

Diaspora Museum Closes

TEL AVIV — The staff at Beth Hatefutsoth, the Nahum Goldmann Museum of the Jewish Diaspora, has been fired and the museum temporarily closed.

Dismissal notices sent to the 100 or so employees earlier this month said the museum was being closed indefinitely "for vacation."

Employees, angered by an eight per cent wage cut, declared a strike June 15.

Driving to Jordan

JERUSALEM — Israelis will be permitted to drive to Jordan beginning some time next month, a senior Jordanian official said last Tuesday. For security reasons, Israeli licence plates will be removed at border crossings in favor of Jordanian plates.

Paternity Leave in IDF?

JERUSALEM — The Israel Defence Force is examining the issue of paternity leave after a reserve officer showed up at his army base with his 4-month-old son.

Ariel Cohen, a reserve captain, had tried unsuccessfully to get an exemption from duty. When Cohen, a reserve captain, joined his unit last week with his baby son in tow, the army gave him an immediate exemption.

WORLD

A Czech List

PRAGUE — A secret list of thousands of Czech Jews was compiled during the Communist regime in the 1980s, reports said here last week.

The Office for the Documentation of Communist Crimes is probing the operation, code-named Spider. It's believed there may have been a plan to hand over the list to terrorist groups, or use it to discredit prominent Jews.

Other reports say the list contained the names of Jews the Czech government was allowing to immigrate to Israel.

Aussie Solidarity

ADELAIDE — More than 1,000 people crammed into a cemetery here last week to express solidarity with the Jewish community of Adelaide, where more than 60 graves and headstones were vandalized earlier this month.

Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin sent a letter expressing his "utter digust" at the desecration.

The government of South Australia said it would provide funds for the "full restoration of the [damaged] tombstones," matching an earlier commitment by the federal government.

Vandalism Condemned

BUCHAREST — Washington's ambassador to Bucharest has condemned the large-scale vandalism of a Jewish cemetery here, and called on Romanian authorities to do the same.

Alfred Moses visited the cemetery to see the 100 gravestones smashed last month.

Jewish leaders say it was the worst incident at a Jewish cemetery since the 1989 fall of Communism.

Klarsfeld Slams France

PARIS — The French government kept or sold assets seized by the collaborationist Vichy regime from Jews deported during the wartime Nazi occupation, Nazi-hunting lawyer Serge Klarsfeld charged last week.

In an interview the day before France apologized for its role in rounding up Jews for deportation, Klarsfeld urged the government to compensate the descendants of Jews who lost their property.

He said millions of francs in cash, valuables and property confiscated from 70,000 Jews deported to concentration camps was transferred to the French treasury after the war.

Soros Rebuked

BRATISLAVA, Slovakia — Slovakia's ruling party said last week it would move to bar American billionaire philanthropist George Soros from the country because he had "slandered" it.

In a July 1 speech, Soros warned of the danger of fascism in Eastern Europe, naming Slovakian Prime Minister Vladimir Meciar, Serbian President Slobodan Milosevic and Croatian President Franjo Tudjman as leading proponents of business interests combined with nationalism, which he called "a classical recipe of fascism."

Soros has refused to withdraw his comments.

Molecular genetics project launched in Israel

Researchers make aliyah en masse

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In an unprecedented move, some half dozen North American researchers are making aliyah en masse to form the nucleus of a new molecular medicine research department at Israel's Technion Institute in Haifa.

Toronto physician Dr. Karl Skorecki, 42, a kidney specialist with expertise in molecular genetics, is the linchpin of the group. Currently the director of nephrology in the Department of Medicine and Pediatrics at the University of Toronto, Skorecki will take on his new position in Israel when the department opens in September.

Israel is a good place to pursue molecular genetic research because its population includes many large extended families, Skorecki told The CJN during an interview at his office in the Hospital for Sick Children. (He is also on staff at the Toronto Hospital.)

The Technion is well suited to his research because of its high technology focus and the school's affiliated 900-bed hospital, the Rambam Medical Centre.

Molecular genetics helps identify individuals, who because of family background, may be prone to certain diseases.

Skorecki's multidisciplinary project, officially known as the Centre of Excellence in Molecular Medicine, is being set up at a cost of $2 million US ($2.8 million Canadian). The Canadian Technion Society in Toronto is raising funds to underwrite the project.

Skorecki's team, which will include Israeli researchers, will focus initially on the genetic causes of kidney disease.

In North America, about 200,000 people need dialysis or a kidney transplant because of kidney failure caused by common disorders such as diabetes or hypertension, which have a predisposing genetic component.

"Our ultimate goal is to prevent kidney failure in the first place," said Skorecki. Within 20 or 30 years, he speculates, scientists will be able to regenerate damaged kidney tissue.

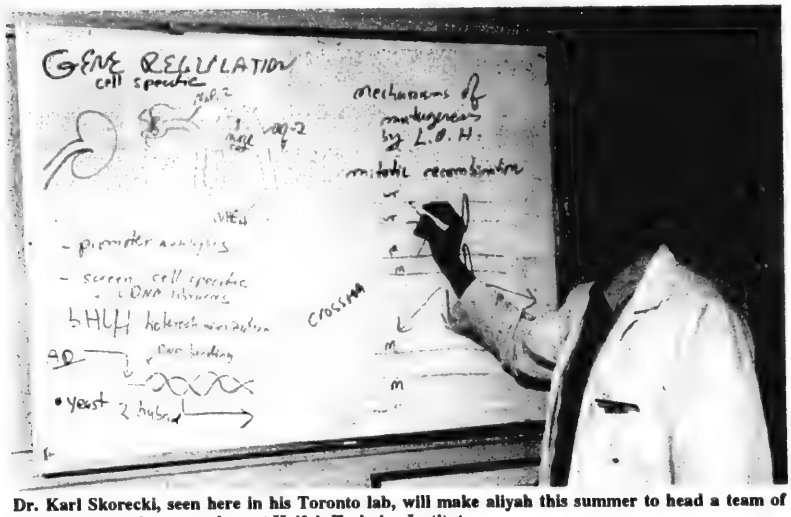
Bettering the human condition is the guiding principle behind Skorecki's work. As an Orthodox Jew, he is strongly motivated by the principle of tikkun olam (improving the world).

He also feels a strong "religious, moral and historical imperative to try and live in Israel." Skorecki, his wife Linda and their five children had a taste of life in Israel five years ago when he was on a six-month sabbatical at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot.

A native of Toronto, Skorecki is an alumnus of Associated Hebrew Schools and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, from which he graduated with the highest academic standing in Canada in 1971.

His unassuming manner offers little hint about the extent of his achievements. After completing medical school at the University of Toronto, where he was a gold medalist in 1977, he spent seven years doing post-graduate work in Boston before returning to Toronto. During university, he also continued Talmud studies, worked part-time as a Hebrew teacher, lifted weights and ran competitively.

His decision to leave Toronto was not an impulsive one, he stressed. He has been very happy here, he said. The opportunity at Technion, however, will give him the chance to fulfil longstanding dreams.



Dr. Karl Skorecki, seen here in his Toronto lab, will make aliyah this summer to head a team of molecular genetics researchers at Haifa's Technion Institute.

Hospice program in danger

TORONTO — Time is running out on the Jewish Hospice Care program.

Most of the financial support for the 3-year-old, $82,000 project comes from the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto's Bequest and Endowment Fund and a private donation. However, funding is scheduled to stop in May 1996. If replacement sources are not found by then, Jewish Hospice Care could shut down.

The team of hospice professionals and volunteers led by Hospice advisory board chair Michael Steele helps terminally ill patients at home. Counselling, pain control and assistance with daily living are among the services supplied.

Hospice Care coordinator Sheila Walker, a Jewish Family & Child Service (JF&CS) social worker, says families of dying patients also receive a lot of help.

Walker and her Hospice Care colleagues, Dr. Larry Librach of Mount Sinai Hospital, JF&CS chaplain Rabbi Ronald Weiss and Renee Montpellier from Senior Care have helped nearly 150 patients to date.

The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto is joined by JF&CS, Mount Sinai Hospital, Senior Care and Baycrest Centre as program participants.

Charges levied against cemetery

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A judgment of over $400,000 has been levied against Bathurst Lawn Memorial Park in a construction lien case going back several years.

It isn't clear whether the cemetery will appeal or what will happen if it can't pay.

The matter stems from road and earth work done in the cemetery by the Geralina Construction Co. of Concord, Ont. beginning in 1989.

The two parties were at odds over the final bill for new roads, repairs, excavations and a sprinkler system.

The contractor claimed that its final bill reflected the costs of extra work to repair what it said was poor subsoil. At a recent trial, the cemetery argued that the cost of repairing the soil was within the contract and not an extra.

A lien was placed on certain properties in the cemetery. The lien is still valid, but according to Geralina's lawyer, James Morton, it does not apply to the graves but only to roads, the parking lot and the cemetery office.

Indeed, in an April judgment from a master of the Ontario Court (General Division), the land's special status was noted, saying the court will handle any sale if it becomes necessary to enforce the lien.

At a June 29 hearing, the court found that Bathurst Lawn owes the construction company $225,000 for extra work, plus $130,000 interest and costs of $50,000, as well as $7,000 in other costs, totalling over $400,000.

The cemetery has paid almost the entire amount of the original contract, which was $409,150.

In its April decision, the court found that the extra work had been ordered by the cemetery's then president, Daniel Geist, and approved by the board.

But the court noted that Geist resigned in 1990 after "ill feelings" arose between him and members of the board, and that a new board was elected in October of that year.

According to Bathurst Lawn president Carl Kellen, the cemetery is owned by 56 synagogues, religious organizations and fraternal societies in Metro. Kellen could not say whether any of them could be liable for costs.

Asked whether the ruling will be appealed, the cemetery's lawyer, Lynn Lenihan, told The CJN "that's privileged information," and declined further comment.

Deportation proceedings dismissed against Nemsila

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The government effort to bring Nazi war criminals to justice was dealt yet another in a series of body blows last week when an Immigration adjudicator dismissed deportation proceedings against alleged war criminal Josef Nemsila.

In a blunt, four-sentence statement, Immigration and Refugee Board (IRB) adjudicator Ed McNamara ruled that Nemsila is a landed immigrant who obtained Canadian domicile and is protected from deportation proceedings. "There is no purpose for carrying on with this inquiry ... The proceedings are closed," he said.

Speaking in halting English immediately after the decision was rendered, Nemsila told a crush of reporters, "I feel very good. I had this feeling. I knew it would happen."

Justice department lawyer Christopher Amerasinghe, who headed a four-member Immigration/Justice legal team, said he wouldn't comment on McNamara's decision until he saw the written reasons. But he appeared shaken when asked how the decision would affect legal proceedings against other alleged Nazi war criminals, offering only, "No comment."

Nemsila was one of four alleged war criminals facing deportation proceedings. The three others are all Canadian citizens who face denaturalization proceedings to strip them of their citizenship before they can be deported.

Government officials turned to the deportation remedy when four criminal prosecutions resulted in one not guilty verdict and three cases were dismissed.

Justice and Immigration officials allege that Nemsila was a member of the pro-Nazi Hlinka Guard in Slovakia and that he misrepresented his involvement with the organization when he immigrated to Canada. His immigration documents label his wartime occupation as "farmer."

Jewish community spokespersons reacted with shock at MacNamara's decision. "I'm very surprised," said Steven Shulman, associate director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

"It will be shocking to most Canadians that someone interpreting the law decided that if you deceive successfully, you can succeed."

Shulman said it appears the decision favors those who enter the country by lying to immigration authorities and getting away with it for 45 years.

He urged federal authorities to appeal the decision.

Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada said "it is a grave injustice that an individual who [allegedly] lied about his past involvement in the arrest, detention and execution of civilians can enter Canada and take refuge behind Canadian laws." He called for an appeal of the decision.

Nemsila's lawyer, Barbara Jackman, said her client denies allegations he lied when he entered Canada. She said Nemsila could still be deported — if federal prosecutors charge him with a criminal offence and he is convicted. "I think the answer is to bring them to a criminal court prosecution where you can apply due process," she said.

"I believe in using the criminal justice system to punish people, not using the immigration system to banish people," she said.

McNamara's decision came after a day of technical legal arguments that focused on domicile, a concept that no longer exists in current immigration law but which was in effect when Nemsila came to Canada in 1950. Jackman argued that Canadian law protects from deportation those domiciled for five years.

Amerasinghe said domicile applies to those who are properly "landed" — to immigrants who have been accepted into Canada for the purposes of remaining permanently. But no one can be lawfully landed if they lied to immigration authorities when they entered the country, he argued.

A report under the Immigration Act, filed with the IRB, alleges that Nemsila was a member of the Hlinka Guard from 1939-45 and was a company commander of a unit of the "alerted Hlinka Guard."

Nemsila served two years in prison but escaped custody from the labor camp in 1949 and fled to Austria. He came to Canada in 1950.

Torah's completion celebrated by Lubavitch

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The wet weather did not dampen the joyful spirit of some 500 people who recently paraded along York Hill Boulevard, dancing and singing as they escorted a newly completed Torah to the Thornhill Chabad Community Centre.

The Torah was dedicated to the memory of the late Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, who died in New York City a year ago.

Chabad Lubavitch has no plans to name a successor to the Rebbe, keynote speaker Rabbi Avraham Shemtov, the leader of Chabad in Philadelphia and the late Rebbe's emissary to the U.S. government, told the audience assembled at Eitz Chaim's Thornhill Campus for the completion of the final last letters of the Torah.

Rabbi Zalman Grossbaum, the executive vice president of Chabad Lubavitch Southern Ontario, told The CJN no one can take the Rebbe's place because no one has his charisma and vision.

The honor of filling in the last few Torah letters was bestowed upon various Chabad leaders and supporters, one of whom was Senator Jerry Graftstein.

Grafstein told the audience that during a period of turmoil in his life he went to see the late Rebbe for advice. "The advice he gave me was tremendous. The problems I thought were overwhelming began to resolve themselves. I saw the power of the rabbi's grasp of human psychology."

Over 500 people helped escort a newly completed Torah to the Thornhill Chabad Community Centre.

Rabbi Grossbaum said the Rebbe had concerned himself with individuals and had affected many people, and so it was a fitting tribute to him to involve the greater Jewish community in the dedication of a Torah.

Chabad sent out 50,000 brochures in an effort to invite as many people as possible to participate in the dedication of the 600,000 letters in the Torah, Rabbi Grossbaum said.

"Many people — in the thousands — sent notes and anonymous gifts. They were not all affiliated with Chabad, but they had been touched by the Rebbe. We were touched by the diverse background of the people."

A Torah dedicated by a community is very unusual because a Torah is usually commissioned by private individuals and dedicated in honor of family members, Rabbi Grossbaum said.

Bronfman praises Rose's integrity

[Cont'd. from page 1]

Charles Bronfman said, "Integrity was the word that came immediately to mind when thinking about Alan. Others are decency, honor and credibility." He praised Rose's dedication to the "dignity and freedom of his fellow Jews" and in particular, his efforts on behalf of Soviet and Ethiopian Jewry and his ability to gain the assistance of Canadian government officials.

Solicitor-General Herb Grey attended the funeral, and a message of condolence from Prime Minister Jean Chretien was read.

Rabbi Howard Joseph of the Spanish and Portuguese, his voice breaking at one point, said, "When Alan Rose spoke, people listened," because he had the knowledge and eloquence that bespoke greatness. "He was a great public servant of the Jewish people."

Rose was deeply influenced by the experience of liberating the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp as a tank commander in the British army, Rabbi Joseph said. He saw action in North Africa, northwest Europe and Italy. After the war, he "devoted his life to the reconstruction of Jewish life."

Born in Dundee, Scotland, in 1921, and educated in London, Rose volunteered in Israel's War of Independence. He emigrated to Canada in 1957 and worked for the Jewish Agency and the forerunner of the Canada-Israel Committee before coming to Congress in 1970, first as assistant director to Saul Hayes. Rose became national executive director in 1974 and three years later, executive vice-president.

He travelled to the remotest Jewish communities in the world and represented Canadian Jewry at numerous international events.

"Alan was a gentleman, a mentsh, with many virtues, of which we most appreciated his patience, tolerance and understanding." These qualities enabled him to appreciate diverse opinions, faiths and cultures, and to make decisions on complex issues, the rabbi said.

Many thousands of Jews in the Soviet Union, Ethiopia, Cuba, Iraq and elsewhere owe their security today to Rose, he said. Rose also played a key role in seeking reparations from Germany for Holocaust survivors.

"[Rose's] name will always be recorded among those who championed the Jewish cause and advanced the interests of the Jewish people in Canada and abroad," wrote World Jewish Congress secretary general Israel Singer.

The president of the Canadian Council of Churches, Alexandra Johnston, sent this message: "Alan ensured that the dialogue among our two faith communities in Canada was frank and substantive."

Apostolic Nuncio Carlo Curis, the Vatican's envoy in Canada, described Rose as "a person of generous dedication and devout commitment."

In an interview last year on his retirement from Congress, Rose said he felt privileged to live at a time that allowed him to participate in momentous events.

"My generation was born in the worst and best of times. We were committed to fight fascism in battle and struggle for the rights of Soviet Jews during the Cold War.

"We witnessed the rescue of Ethiopian Jews, in which CJC played a major part in concert with the Israeli government.

"These and countless other issues have enriched my life, as they were events of great purpose for our people."

Current national executive director Jack Silverstone said, "Alan gained universal respect in Canadian society, from the top levels of government and the civil service to interfaith communities and the diplomatic corps. He was a committed Zionist, with a tremendous desire to see peace in the Middle East."

Among his many honors, Rose was a member of the Order of Canada and received, in 1980, the U.S. Presidential Citation of Honor as a camp liberator. Last year, the French government awarded him the Médaille Militaire de la Libération.

At the CJC Plenary Assembly in May, he was given the Samuel Bronfman Medal, and last month received the Jerusalem Prize from the World Zionist Organization.

Rose is survived by wife Joyce and sister Hazel Tovey in Israel.

Rabbi Pearlson to retire

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After 41 years as the spiritual head of Temple Sinai, Rabbi Jordan Pearlson, 71, is concerned that he not become a "blessed antique" who is revered but ignored.

Rabbi Jordan Pearlson

Though he is being honored at a retirement tribute dinner August 26, the new "founding rabbi" hopes he'll still keep close contact with the temple membership.

He has a vivid memory of the early days in 1954 when a small group of families living in Lawrence Manor hired him to help found the second Reform temple in Ontario. He had been offered assistantships in Milwaukee and Hollywood, Calif., and his family and friends chided his decision to go to Canada.

The young rabbi too had a lot at stake. He worked as a cutter's assistant in the clothing business when he found firms weren't hiring Jewish engineers. He took a year in law school but developed a distaste of the law, and instead headed for the rabbinate.

But come to Canada he did. "It was the luckiest decision of my life," he said. "I found here the congenial atmosphere of British propriety and morality with which I was already familiar from my upbringing in Boston."

He well remembers Temple Sinai's first office over a hardware store on Bathurst Street where the bedrooms were converted to midweek Hebrew classrooms. At the High Holy Day services in the old Glendale Theatre on Avenue Road members had to arrive early to change the light bulbs, and change them back again for the theatre's matinee performance.

Two years later a start was made on its present structure on Wilson Avenue. "We began to build a permanent home," he said. "We received $25,000 as a loan from Holy Blossom and we had $475,000 of chutzpah."

Without a sanctuary of its own, Temple Sinai was offered space in Ashbury and West United Church on Bathurst Street, the first such courtesy ever offered to a Jewish congregation.

When he first arrived in Toronto, the rabbi stayed on weekends with various families who were active in its founding. He said he is "eternally grateful" not only to that group but to the high quality lay leadership and staff he has worked with over the years.

He was lucky to be in Toronto, he said, when the post-war boom was developing and the growth of Temple Sinai coincided over the next four decades with the rise of the Toronto Jewish community to become one of the most vigorous in the Diaspora.

Temple Sinai was able to integrate into its fold various waves of newcomers. "I was anxious that we not develop a sort of Germanic-Chicago style of temple. We wanted everyone to feel comfortable." This is one of the reasons the temple has annual Yiddish nights which attract overflow crowds.

In September of 1958, Rabbi Pearlson married Geraldine Goldstein. They were married for 27 years. They have three children, Joshua, Nessa and Abigail, and one granddaughter, Rayna Jae, daughter of Joshua and Rossana Pearlson. Joshua is in real estate and investments, Nessa is in TV production in New York and Abigail is a student at York University.

Tourism at Baycrest

TORONTO — Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care has expanded into a new field — tourism!

Complete with customized ticket (general admission, of course) and special hats and T-shirts, the centre recently hosted a bus tour, with Baycrest volunteers and staff as guides, to educate canvassers about the facilities, programs, services and fundraising campaign.

The tour of the Baycrest campus was also aimed at community members who wanted to learn more about the centre. The bus stopped at various points of interest for tour guide discussions.

Stroke Recovery Group

TORONTO — Some came in wheelchairs and some walked, supported by canes, but everyone enjoyed the food, hummed along to the music and even did the hoochy-coochy, at the Bathurst Jewish Centre's (BJC) fifth annual Stroke Recovery Group dinner.

The group has about 50 members, all of whom have had strokes and have been through some rehabilitation. They meet three times a week at the BJC for exercise, swimming, socializing and outings.

Irene Lastman, coordinator of the dinner held recently at the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, suffered a stroke 13 years ago. She said she was "overwhelmed by the number of members, spouses, support persons and group volunteers who came.

"For some, it is the first party they've attended since their stroke. It was a tremendous accomplishment just to get here."

She said the group was a great factor in rehabilitation after her stroke and that it contributes to the members' well-being "in body, mind and spirit."

Rabbi Schneerson's Yahrzeit

TORONTO — "... and even though Mashiach may tarry, (still) I await his coming every day."

On the first anniversary of the death of the Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, his personal secretary urged Jews everywhere to prepare for the coming of Mashiach.

"Mashiach is on the way and to prepare ourselves, we must add more goodness and kindness each day," Rabbi Leibel Groner told a recent gathering sponsored by the Toronto division of International Campaign to Help Bring Mashiach, held in honor of the Lubavitcher Rebbe.

Rabbi Groner, the Rebbe's secretary for over 45 years, told the crowd at Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue, that the ultimate purpose of a yahrzeit is to recollect that person's life and dwell on what they meant to us. "Yahrzeit is a day of reconnection and reattachment — a day to think about what the Rebbe has inspired in us and how we can continue on with his ideals.

"As we reflect on his yahrzeit, we must think about what we are going to do. If we believe in the Rebbe's philosophy then we should take a lesson from him. We should fulfil his wishes by doing something each day and then taking it upon ourselves to doing something more."

Library Dedicated

TORONTO — Hy Lampert was surrounded by family and friends who gathered to dedicate a library in his name.

Located in the B'nai Brith Upper Canada Lodge Senior Citizen's Building, the new Hy Lampert Library is a popular gathering place for residents, with its overflowing bookshelves, comfortable arm chairs, writing tables and soft colors.

Lampert was one of the original signing members of the 1946 Upper Canada Lodge B'nai Brith charter and the 13th lodge president.

She'arim Annual Brunch

TORONTO — The Jewish community cannot isolate itself from the greater society, Sheila Finestone, Secretary of State for Multiculturalism, recently told an audience of 275.

Finestone was the keynote speaker at the Dr. Abraham Shore Academy She'arim Hebrew Day School annual brunch held at the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

Murray and Clara Shore were honored for their work on behalf of the school, Canada's first and only Jewish day school for children with learning disabilities.

"In Canada, Jews are living with tolerance and we should extend that to our neighbors," Feinstone said.

She praised She'arim students and alumni for their achievements.

Cory Shiner, 20, a former student, told the audience his teachers at She'arim gave him the learning tools to excel academically. They showed him how to compensate for his learning disabilities by capitalizing on his strengths, he said. "They challenged me to succeed. If it wasn't for their efforts I wouldn't be where I am today."

Shiner graduated from She'arim with honors and went on to finish Thornhill High School with an 82 per cent average. He is currently attending a college recreational leadership program and he is the co-founder and co-owner of Kids of Canada Hockey Camp.

New Lubavitch School

TORONTO — As part of the ongoing expansion of the Chabad Lubavitch Hebrew School in Toronto, a new school will be opened this fall in the Bathurst/Eglinton-Forest Hill area, at the Forest Hill Public School.

The Hebrew School's southern branch will be the only Orthodox-run Hebrew School in the area catering to children and their families, no matter what level of observance. The Hebrew School will provide Jewish education for public school children ages 5-15, offering a six-hour a week program on Monday, Wednesday and Sunday.

Bread and Butter

The premier of Ontario certainly has a mandate to undertake firm measures to reduce the province's annual operating and cumulative deficit. Deficit reduction was one of the key planks in his campaign platform. And it was on his platform that the plurality of Ontario voters recently chose to make their electoral stand. We therefore commend the new government for its determination to be true to its campaign promises. But we question the manner of the budget cutting performed last week and the nature of some of the $1.9-billion cuts.

To be sure, it is better to act resolutely when yielding a remedial scalpel. Indecision often merely forestalls the inevitable and prolongs the pathology. But decisive action does not preclude proper nor thoughtful action.

The premier was obviously determined to act swiftly. Justifiably so. But a reduction in the province's budget in the magnitude of almost $2 billion would have been more appropriately announced on the floor of the Legislature in session rather than in the media conference room.

There is more than symbolism to the chamber. There is the intellectual requirement of demonstrating the reasoning underlying the specifics of one's policies that parliamentary debate demands.

The economic statement announcing the cuts was brief. It stressed primarily the need for budget reductions, about which there is hardly any serious question. But it mostly ignored the rationale for the cuts actually made. Indeed some of the targets were less logical than they were easy; for example, the welfare needy.

Welfare rates for about 500,000 people will be cut by 21.6 per cent starting Oct. 1. That will effectively take away $311 a month from a single mother with which to provide for her two children. Her new allowance will be $1,126. How will she be able to provide the necessities of life to her family?

The premier introduced the budget cutting last week by saying: "We must all share in the sacrifices if we are to share in the gains ..." But even the Globe and Mail noticed that "the poorest people in Ontario – those dependent on social assistance – will bear the largest single share of the cuts ..."

What gains will be left for welfare recipients to share after they have sacrificed their bread and butter?

Water

As of this writing, it appears that the July 25 deadline for the completion of the Phase 2 agreement between Israel and the Palestinians will not be met. Despite the ongoing efforts by the two sides to find common ground, a number of unresolved issues are blocking agreement. One of the most difficult issues is water.

Naturally enough, Israel is worried that the availability of water for use by settlements on both sides of the Green Line will be seriously impaired if they cede autonomy over the land to the Palestinians.

Writing in the July 21 issue of the Jerusalem Post , Steve Rodan explained the background of the difficulty. Israel derives 80 per cent of its annual 600 million cubic meters (mcm) of water from three aquifers that originate in Judea and Samaria. The western aquifer, which flows from under the Samarian Hills to the coast, forms the main supply of water to the Greater Tel Aviv area and produces 350 mcm of water per year. The northern aquifer extends from Jenin to the Mt. Gilboa area and supplies water to the Jezreel Valley and Beit She'an. It produces 140 mcm of water per year. Both the western and the northern aquifers, Israeli officials say, are fully exploited. The eastern aquifer, however, extending from the Judean Hills eastward to the Jordan River, has the potential of producing 170 mcm of water per year, 50 per cent more than its current output.

Control over these three aquifers, including any new drilling arrangements in the eastern aquifer, is vital to Israel. It is therefore not hard to understand why water has proven to be one of the most difficult issues to resolve.

An agreement between the two peoples will founder or flourish on the issue of water — its joint use, distribution, preservation, development and management — in addition to that of security.

Argues Bristow protected Jews

Richard Cleroux's column in June 22 CJN provided a selective and unbalanced critique of the findings in the Security Intelligence Review Committee's (SIRC) report, the Heritage Front Affair and used the testimony of Elisse Hategan to do so. SIRC's report, in contrast, was based on the review of 25,000 pages of documents and contacts with more than 100 people.

The committee's report criticized many aspects of the CSIS human source operation which infiltrated the Heritage Front. But SIRC also recognized that in order to be credible to the racist targets, a source has to play the role well. The SIRC report noted that the information from the CSIS source contributed to hundreds of intelligence reports, 80 threat assessments to other agencies, the deportation or expulsion from Canada of no fewer than five foreign white supremacists, and the weakening of some racist efforts against Jewish groups and others. The information that the source gave to CSIS concerning threats to the Jewish community was turned over to the police.

Among the many findings, SIRC revealed that the source turned a death threat campaign against militant anti-racists into an aggressive information collection exercise. The committee found, however, that the serious harassment of anti-racists was unacceptable. We criticized CSIS management for their ignorance of the harassment. We also took issue with the sporadic intimidation of Jewish groups. On balance, however, the committee found that the source's information served to protect the Jewish community.

Contrary to the impression left by the article, SIRC found that neither the CSIS source nor Grant Bristow ever spied on the Reform party. That party had independently received several early warnings about racist interest in it, to little effect.

Mr. Cleroux and Ms. Hategan are, of course, entitled to their views. Committee members sought to have Ms. Hategan appear before them. After considerable effort, we thought she had agreed, but the media informed us that our proposal had been rejected. Hategan's counsel refused to provide us with her sworn affidavits, but we did obtain some of them through other means.

There was no evidence to support the article's assertion that Bristow or the source, "helped initiate, plan and execute the violent encounter." On the contrary, some of Hategan's statements inadvertently reaffirmed the SIRC findings that others were responsible for Heritage Front confrontations.

Finally, I would like to repeat here SIRC's concluding comment on the Heritage Front Affair: "We would like to put on record our unshakeable conviction that the Government of Canada, through all means at its disposal, should continue to ensure that it is always aware of what is going on within extreme right-wing racist and neo-Nazi groups. Canadians should never again repeat the mistakes of the past by underestimating the potential for harm embodied in hate-driven organizations."

I commend the full SIRC report, available from the Solicitor General of Canada, to your readers.

"To my friends in Quebec"

I was in Ottawa recently and the air in the hotel restaurant was full of that lilting French-Canadian language which is so expressive and seems to convey a meaning even when you don't understand the words.

It carried me back to the days when I worked in Ottawa, when I sang Alouette with my French-Canadian friends at parties. It even made me recall the impact on me of Two Solitudes by Hugh MacLennan, a definitive outline of the Canadian political reality, which nevertheless was optimistic about the future.

The thought that Quebec might separate from Canada and that those mellifluous accents would not be part of my country saddened me. Though I never lived in Montreal, the poetry of A. M. Klein brought me close to my French-Canadian compatriots, as did holidays in the Laurentians and the Eastern Townships.

Canada is a land peopled by immigrants as well as its two founding races. My own parents came from Romania in 1910 and 1911 and went off on their honeymoon from Montreal to Ste. Agathe with a horse and sleigh. Before he became a pedlar in Ontario, my father had a shoe repair in Windsor Station and many of my relatives came to Toronto on rail tickets that were given to him in payment for services.

My own love of Yiddish is deep and stems from the years I heard it in our home and Sunday night gatherings of mishpachah around a beer barrel. Will anybody blame me for understanding how committed French-Canadians are to their language and culture because I am to my own — all under the umbrella of Canada?

The debate on separatism may have weightier matters than the ones I have mentioned. Still, I hold out my hand to my friends in Quebec. We have a lot in common.

Offensive material at Billy Graham mission

I respect the evangelist Billy Graham. He is a force for good, unlike some others on the preachers' circuit. In the past several decades of his ministry, his moral integrity has not been besmirched.

Still, at his recent appearance in SkyDome, a newspaper, the Endeavour, with the imprimatur of Mission Ontario with Billy Graham 1995, was widely distributed. In it there are advertisements by two Jews for Jesus groups.

Even if Graham had no knowledge of this shenanigan beforehand, he should denounce it. Like Caesar's wife, the reverend must be above suspicion. And his organizers should be sensitive to Jewish concerns.

Post-Zionism: A cause for concern?

By DAVID NEWMAN

A new phrase has been introduced to the Israeli lexicon during the past year. The phrase is post-Zionism and it has caused much consternation amongst Israelis and the wider Jewish community throughout the world. The very term suggests that Zionism is finished. The idealism that has been for so long associated with the founding of a Jewish homeland and the creation of pioneering and utopian forms of Jewish living has, according to this definition, disappeared. There is no longer any unique ideology or philosophy underlying the very existence of the State of Israel.

Under such "post-Zionist" conditions, there is no longer any justification for the existence of the State of Israel in the Middle East, surrounded by a sea of Islam. We should simply pack our bags and return to Europe, perhaps, as Philip Roth described in his recent novel, Operation Shylock, become part of the "Diasporism" movement which sets out to return Jews to their original "homeland" in Europe.

The right wing opponents of the present government and the ongoing peace negotiations use the term post-Zionism as a means of showing how, in their view, Israel has lost its way and no longer reflects the values and ideals of the founding fathers.

The post-Zionism discourse has come about partially as a result of the parallel debates about concepts of post-modernism during the past five years. It is "in" for something to be "post." For us to reject and negate the many theories and models of human behavior which social scientists have set up for themselves over the past century is considered to be innovative and revolutionary. Human behavior is too complicated to fit into an ordered and progressive framework. Rather, as post-modernists would argue, a bit of everything and a bit of nothing. It may not quite be anarchy, but it does allow the mind to roam without being constrained by any specific dogma that obligates us to think and rationalize in a given way. Until, of course, post-modernism becomes (as it already has) the new dogma without which we are simply not part of the ongoing battle for the minds and ideas of the future generations.

I first used the term post-Zionism in a short article published in the twice-yearly newsletter of the Israel Geographical Association back in 1989. As a settlement planner, having carried out much work on the changing nature of rural settlement and communities in Israel, I argued that we were moving into a post-Zionist settlement landscape. Kibbutzim and moshavim were undergoing (and continue to undergo) much internal transformation. From the original notion of agricultural collectives, they were becoming middle class industrial and tertiary communities. New settlements, established throughout the 1970s and 1980s, were dormitory communities (known in Israel as yishuvim kehilati'im), in which the residents purchased a plot of land, constructed their detached, low-density, housing unit and commuted to their previous places of employment in the major metropolitan centres of Haifa, Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. These were not constructed only in the West Bank, but throughout the Galilee, the coastal plain and the northern Negev. Many of the moshavim transformed their agricultural land into residential plots and changed their status to that of dormitory community.

There was dancing in the streets of Tel Aviv when the State of Israel was proclaimed in 1948. The joy is evident on the face of this young girl, held aloft on her father's shoulders. David Newman argues, however, that the "realization of the Zionist dream" did not stop at this one moment in history. Rather, the fulfilment of the Zionist dream is, and always will be, an ongoing process. [photo by LIFE]

Needless to say, there was some strong criticism of the use of the terminology. In the following issue of the bulletin, some of my colleagues responded by refuting the concept of a post-Zionism landscape. The theme which emerged from the responses was that change in society does not necessarily mean a total refutation of the ideological underpinnings of society itself. Yes, they argued, it was true that the whole nature of settlement policy and planning was undergoing transformation. But this reflected the move away from the dominance of a particular socialist Zionist ideology to one which was more diverse and varied, one which reflected the nature of a western society in the latter part of the 20th century. Clearly, such a society would be influenced by normal economic processes of suburbanization, a search for a better quality of life outside the overcrowded and polluted urban centres, and a desire to live a "normal" middle class life within the Jewish homeland. Why should it be any different in Israel from anywhere else in the western world? After all, it is precisely this form of "normalcy" the Zionist founders and pioneers dreamed about, but which was not realized in their lifetime.

The same type of transformations can be witnessed in many other areas of Israeli life. By competing within a global community, Israel has been prepared to accept innovation and change. This is as true in the world of industry, computers and tourism as it is of settlement planning. These transformations are slowly changing Israel into a hi-tech society which can, despite its over-bureaucratized governmental structure, which remains one of the worst remnants of the rigid socialist Zionism, hold its own, and even take a leading role in the international community. The Zionist forefathers and founders had no such conceptions. They were concerned first and foremost with the founding of a Jewish homeland which would be a haven for persecuted Jews from throughout the world and to a lesser extent, with the creation of a model and utopian society which would reflect the very best of Jewish values, philosophy and teachings. The homeland exists; it is an undeniable fact. But the model society which can provide equitable social milieux for both religious and secular, for Jew and Arab, is far from being created.

Post-Zionism can be interpreted as characterizing the changing nature of Israeli society, which is adaptive to change and understands the need to shed its over-reliance on some of its unique characteristics, many of which often constrained socio-economic development, in an effort to become an equal partner within the changing international arena. Zionism was, and remains, about the creation of a state, a Jewish homeland, which would take a leading role in health, welfare, industry and social development. Zionism was not about creating a state which would always be portrayed as a social misfit, requiring the pity and assistance of the international community. Nor was it always meant to remain a society of agricultural pioneers. Each generation of Israelis has to adapt to the social and economic aspirations and constraints of the specific period in which they live.

We should not confuse the concepts of change and continuity. Change does not mean there is no continuity. It is change itself which ensures continuity of the Zionist dream — the formation of a healthy and strong society. The post-Zionist era represents the continued fulfilment of the Zionist dream. This includes the signing of peace agreements with Israel's neighbors and protagonists, since without peace we will continue to live in an abnormal situation, one in which all major issues of social and political concern within the country are pushed aside as we deal with the existential threat facing the state.

If this is post-Zionism, then we should be congratulating ourselves on the way in which it has been achieved, rather than viewing it critically. Post-Zionism is the Zionism of today. Without Zionism, the state would not have been created. Without post-Zionism, drawing strongly on its Zionist roots but at the same time shedding those parts of the mechanics of Zionism which are no longer relevant, the state will not find its way into the 21st century. Peace is post-Zionism; a strong and flourishing industrial economy is post-Zionism. Post-Zionism is the realization of the Zionist dream — a strong, healthy and independent State of Israel.

Dr. David Newman, from Ben-Gurion University in the Negev, has spent two years as a Canada-Israel Academic Exchange Fellow at Canadian universities. This is the second of a trilogy of articles Dr. Newman wrote for The CJN prior to his return to Israel.

Opinions

Jews by choice are real Jews also

Jean M. Gerber

When our young family arrived in the summer of 1971 to take up residence in Jerusalem we found an unfurnished flat near the centre of the city and began to assemble a hodgepodge of furniture suitable for two small children, two grandparents and ourselves.

Our landlord, seeing our distress at the lack of dishes, towels and other household items, arrived with an enormous load of stuff to tide us over. Imagine his surprise when he learned that the grandparents were not Jewish!

"But I thought you were a nice Jewish girl," he blurted.

We subsequently became fast friends and I hope he and his wife enjoyed many years of their retirement. However, he has not been the only one to tell me, once my status as a Jew by choice became known, that they had thought all along I was "a nice Jewish girl."

Today some people feel Jews are an endangered species in North America. Yet the attitude persists that Jews by choice are often part of the problem, rather than of the solution. Let me tell you some of the things that make us, as choosers, recoil in pain, and then what we bring to our chosen people.

First, the pain. The word shiksa must be one of the most odious epithets ever invented. I implore you not to use it. The same goes for goyische kopf which, as shiksas, we would be expected to have. (The words for non-Jewish men and women come from the biblical Hebrew for detestable thing.)

Furthermore, intermarriage is not the union of a Jew by birth and a Jew by choice. It is a marriage of a Jew and a non-Jew.

The "Draw your family tree" exercise at our son's day school was another painful experience. Where do you put the non-Jewish grandparents? Since one of them was a minister and the other the church organist, what do you say about their professions? Today I would do an in-your-face family tree. At that time, I felt only confusion and anger that my children had to answer questions beyond their understanding.

Of course there was joy as well as pain. Wonderful people supported us from the beginning, understanding our choice (my husband's as much as mine). We found a combative and compassionate rabbi; many families in Vancouver and Israel mentored our early years; our families came to accept our decision. Other Jews by choice began to appear.

Be assured, however, that we will not be like other Jews. For one thing, we often bring with us the most amazing networks. In addition to my minister father and musician-teacher mother, I can name converts who are children of a British military family, a farmer, a policeman, a French-Canadian Catholic family (two of the latter).

Obviously we have celebrated other holidays in our lives. We might bring something so ordinary as a new dish to the New Year or Chanukah table, or we may bring a different "take" on a biblical story. We may know the Hebrew Bible better than born Jews. We may have studied Jewish history, laws and customs more rigorously than our spouses and end up being the information-givers to others.

As we become a more multi-ethnic society, converts will come in all races and colors. If you are not prepared for this, it is time to examine your own views of the shades in which Jews come.

Whole families convert to Judaism, a culture that prizes family, community and a system of ethical living. In this age of moral relativism and isolation, such values are hard to find.

Finally, Jews by choice bring an incredible commitment to Jewish community and Jewish daily living. I am not only talking about kosher kitchens; I am talking about assuming major roles in the Jewish communal structure, about children in day schools, camps and Israel. I am talking about the ability to talk about Jewish family life and God as major factors in choosing to become Jewish. These are issues Jews by birth often side step. They may be too uncomfortable, too idealistic, too much like religion. Born Jews are often comfortable with ethnic identity and uncomfortable with discussion of religion or ethics.

In the days of the Second Temple, most rabbis welcomed proselytes. Judaism then, as now, was an attractive religion to people seeking a spiritual home that gave meaning to daily life and committed the individual to a community. Christianity largely usurped this role after its conquest of the Roman Empire.

Today Judaism has a chance to again become the home religion of more and more people. Instead of viewing this with alarm, we should point with pride to those who have chosen to be Jewish. The Judaism of the 21st century will thank us.

The missing child syndrome

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

I remember my good and lamented friend Norman Cousins once giving me a piece of advice: "If you write a book you have two or three pages to attract your readers or turn them off; if you write an essay you have one paragraph; if you write an article you have one sentence. Catch them early or you won't catch them at all." I don't know whether matters work out exactly in this fashion, but as a general rule what Cousins had to say was probably true.

All this came to mind recently, when I leafed through a number of bulletins and journals that had accumulated and my eye fell on a headline: The Missing Child in Liberal Theory. "Missing Child" spoke to me of the terrible fear and reality of abductions, and therefore of a dreaded aspect of society that touches all of us. And the second part of the headline, "Liberal Theory," sounded familiar to me, as a lifelong aficionado of liberalism. But what connection was there?

So, pace Cousins, I started to read the article in a little four-page bulletin published by the Jewish Family & Child Service of Toronto.

The Missing Child in Liberal Theory is, I learned, a book by John O'Neill, jointly reviewed by Gary Foster and Gordon Wolfe, president and executive director of the service. I read on:

"The author advocates that if Canada is to survive as a national unity, Canadians must reaffirm their commitment to a sustainable society that acknowledges our obligations to each other and to the next generation." The author, I read, relies on a "covenant theory" which rejects the notion that a community is nothing more than a collection of individuals who are in competition with each other in the market place. In the convenant view there are other components that are equally important, and in fact more so: questions of health, justice, security, education and employment. These are not commodities that can be acquired or discarded; they are the very foundations of the society that we know and, say Foster and Wolfe, "they represent the social debt we owe to this and future generations."

So, what about the missing child in liberal theory? O'Neill's main point is simply this: Unless we develop in our children more than a sense of acquisition and ambition as desirable qualities, and unless we perceive of life as more than competition and advancement, we are robbing our children. The most important element we must impart to them is that all life is reciprocal. Children will be starved, not only when they don't have enough to eat, but also when they don't have enough to make them responsible and even eager participants in the life of the community. We must pass on to them the sense of covenant, that is to say, of mutual responsibility.

I have not read the book, but the theme appeals to me, for it parallels Jewish teaching. In the Pirke Avot, Hillel says: "Do not separate yourself from the community." If we believe that looking out for "number 1" is life's major challenge we are short-changing not only ourselves but our offspring as well.

I think I will read Mr. O'Neill's book, for I need every argument at hand to support my conviction that what Judaism has to say on the matter of personal and communal interaction is worth repeating.

Patai: creator of academic richness

By Arnold Ages

Bible scholar, Talmudist, linguist, cultural anthropologist, historian, literary critic, translator, political scientist and chemist, he is the first person to have been granted a PhD from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

His name — Raphael Patai. In a few months he will, at 86, be publishing another opus magnum, a History of Hungarian Jewry, adding another important title to more than 50 books he has written and edited, since his first book in Hebrew, on the poetry of Israel Fontanella, appeared in 1933.

Patai, the son of a distinguished Hungarian-Jewish journalist who was editor of Molt es Jovo (Past and Future) in Budapest (the magazine was resuscitated three years ago in the city), went to Palestine after studying at the rabbinical seminary in the Hungarian capital. He arrived in Jerusalem the year Hitler took power in Germany.

Deeply committed to Zionism and the renaissance of Hebrew, Bible and Jewish learning in general, Patai began 62 years ago to publish a series of seminal works on diverse aspects of the Jewish experience. One can appreciate the broad nature of Patai's intellectual interests by observing the richness of his academic pursuits.

In 1936, inspired by his doctoral work, he wrote a probing study of water in Palestinian folklore, at a time when the word "Palestinian" was a synonym for Jewish. In executing this ground breaking essay he combed the Talmud for relevant material. Many of his early books focused on anthropological concerns, ancient Jewish myths and ritual and a fascinating inquiry into the mortuary customs of the Jews of Meshed.

Patai moved to the United States in 1947 and the stream of inspired scholarship continued unabated — with English now as the major vehicle for the transmission of his pioneering research. In the 1940s and 1950s Patai produced authoritative surveys of Jordan, Syria and Lebanon, and illuminating analyses of societal structures in the Middle East in general.

In 1964, he collaborated with the late Edmund Wilson, the dean of American literary critics, in an original exploration of the Book of Genesis. Patai continued in this pathway with his striking inquiry into vestigial remains of ancient paganism in his essay The Hebrew Goddess in 1967.

During this period, Patai also busied himself with editing five volumes of Studies in Folklore and Ethnology, seven volumes of the Herzl Year Book, five volumes of the Herzl diaries and the two volume Encyclopedia of Zionism and Israel.

In his 60s and 70s — when most scholars retreat into retirement — Patai began to publish some of his most stimulating and provocative works: The Arab Mind, The Myth of the Jewish Race (with the collaboration of his daughter Jennifer Wing) and The Jewish Mind. In all of these works, Patai is scrupulously objective and never sacrifices facts in the interest of pushing a particular doctrine.

I personally have learned much from all of Patai's works but everyone has favorites. His two-volume autobiographical memoir and collected family correspondence are poignant testimonials to the Patai clan in Budapest. Patai's monumental work on The Jewish Alchemists, published just two years ago, is a model of how a scholar can take a much neglected subject and breathe new life into it.

One book I have found especially endearing is Ignaz Goldziher and his Oriental Diary, which came out in 1987. Goldziher, a great Hungarian-Jewish Islamicist, has been the source of the oft heard assertion that Islam was a tolerant society towards Jews. Patai's memoir shows that Goldziher was an embittered genius who could not obtain a university post in 19th century Hungary because of Christian anti-Semitism and had to scrape by as a shammas in a synagogue to make ends meet. His portrait of a tolerant Islam was a way to get back at the Christianity which rejected him.

Wayne State University Press will shortly be publishing Patai's History of Hungarian Jewry. It's a work of surpassing intelligence and analysis, which combines the author's fine writing style, deep historical insights and literary tastes. The rabbis called Hungary "Eretz Hagar." Patai takes us through a thousand years of Hungarian Jewish history in this volume and shows how the Jewish minority within another minority in Europe contributed so much to Jewish culture and civilization in general.

I wonder what Raphael Patai's next book will be?

The Kirshner File

They died recently, leaving footprints in time

By Sheldon Kirshner

Horace Kadorie, a businessman, was the scion of a distinguished Hong Kong Sephardi family originally from Iraq. Among his companies were the Peninsula Hotel and the China Light and Power Company. During World War II, the children of European Jewish refugees found a haven in a school the family supported.

Bernard Nahum founded Turkey's automobile industry, manufacturing its first locally-made car — the Anadol — in 1977.

Bernard Cornfeld was a giant in the American mutual fund industry until his downfall in the 1970s. His company, Investors Overseas Services, held assets of about $2 billion. Admirers called him a brilliant innovator.

Leon Tamman, a native of Sudan who lived in Switzerland and Britain, headed an international empire of construction companies, hotels and financial management firms. His investments in Israel totalled about $100 million and included the Daniel Hotel in Herzlyia and the Jerusalem Capital Studios. He was a leader of the World Sephardic Federation.

Victor Potamkin was the world's largest Cadillac dealer. Apart from their flagship Manhattan dealership, which sold more than 6,000 Cadillacs last year, he and his sons, Robert and Alan, controlled more than 50 automobile franchises, worth $1 billion, across the United States. The son of a fishmonger, Potamkin was a flamboyant salesman. In 1948, when Israel's first president, Chaim Weizmann, visited New York City, he presented him with a free Lincoln car.

Stanley Elkin was a renowned novelist and short story writer whose work veered toward black humor and parody. He was the author of Criers and Kibitzers, Kibitzers and Criers, The Magic Kingdom and Searchers and Seizures. His posthumous novel, Mrs. Ted Bliss, will be published in September. He taught writing at Washington University in St. Louis.

Claudio Segre, born in Palermo, Italy, was a historian who specialized in Italian fascism. Segre's biography of Italo Balbo, a prominent fascist, won the Marraro Prize of the Society of Italian Historical Studies. His father, Emilio, was a Nobel Prize-winning physicist who emigrated to the United States, where Claudio was raised.

Edwin Blum wrote Hollywood screenplays. His most famous ones were The Adventures of Sherlock Holmes (1939), which starred Basil Rathbone, and Stalag 17 (1953), which was nominated for an Academy Award. Blum also churned out TV scripts for The Man from U.N.C.L.E., 77 Sunset Strip and Hawaii Five-O. In addition, he produced speeches for two U.S. presidential aspirants, Adlai Stevenson and Hubert Humphrey.

Mikhail Botvinnik was the world chess champion from 1948 to 1963. Born in St. Petersburg, he was a prodigy who lost his crown twice, only to regain it. A Communist until his death, he described himself as "Jewish by race" and "Russian by culture."

Albert Hackett was a playwright most noted for his play, The Diary of Anne Frank, which he and his wife, Frances, adapted from Anne Frank: The Diary of a Young Girl. A Pulitzer Prize winner, the play was later turned into a Hollywood movie.

Sidney Kingsley (Kirshner) lit up Broadway with several plays, the most lauded of which were Men in White (for which he won a Pulitzer Prize) and Dead End. Kingsley's themes revolved around gritty social issues.

Gottfried Reinhardt was a film producer who worked on Greta Garbo's last, lacklustre movie, Two-Faced Woman. He also produced The Red Badge of Courage, based on the novel by Stephen Crane. Reinhardt's father, Max, the famous stage director, fled Nazi Germany.

Jerry Lester, a comedian, was the host of the first late-night TV talk and variety show, Broadway Open House. Lester also appeared on radio and in several Hollywood movies.

Henry Rogers was one of the best-known Hollywood press agents. His clients included Kirk Douglas, Joan Crawford, Rita Hayward and Gary Cooper.

Dmitri Kessel was a distinguished photographer whose finest work appeared in Life magazine during World War II. Kessel also photographed royalty and timeless works of art.

James McHaney was an American prosecutor during the 1946 Nuremberg war crimes tribunal. He is credited with gathering the evidence which convicted Nazis of conducting grisly medical experiments on concentration camp inmates.

Adolph Lowe was a political economist at the New School for Social Research in New York City until his retirement in 1978. He was the last surviving member of the University in Exile, formed by the New School and the New York state legislature to attract scholars who had fled German Nazism. Before the rise of the Nazis, he taught at the University of Frankfurt and was an advisor to the ill-fated Weimar government.

Victor Dorman was the first entrepreneur in the United States to package cheese. Until the late 1940s, it had been sold in bulk and sliced in stores. Dorman, chair of the Manhattan-based Dorman Cheese Company, changed all that.

Peter Wilenski was a diplomat who headed Australia's Department of Foreign Affairs and Trade and represented his country as ambassador to the United Nations. Born in Lodz, Poland, he and his parents immigrated to Sydney via Eastern Europe, the Middle East and China. He practised medicine before entering government service.

Harry Bergold, the American ambassador to Nicaragua in the late 1980s, blew the whistle on the secret operation in which U.S. government funds were illegally channelled to anti-Sandinista forces by Col. Oliver North. His courage angered conservatives in the U.S. Senate, who succeeded in cutting his career short.

Harry Rosenfeld was a senior American government administrator who helped devise the school lunch program in 1946 and supervised the resettlement of 500,000 European refugees in the United States after World War II. An authority on immigration law, he was an advocate of liberal immigration policies.

Trevor Dupuy was a prolific military historian. One of his books, Elusive Victory: The Arab-Israeli Wars 1947-1974, was published in 1978, and still remains one of the finest of the genre.

Israel courts Arab states

In a bid to capitalize on its success in reaching an historic rapprochement with the PLO in 1993, Israel is reaching out to Arab states far from the centre of the Arab-Israeli dispute.

Israel has made contact with, among others, Oman, Qatar and Mauritania, but has so far failed to establish formal diplomatic relations with these countries, all of which belong to the Arab League.

The limited progress is a source of discouragement to Israel. But the fact remains that Israel is making strides in dismantling the Arab wall of hostility.

Oman and Qatar are cases in point.

Last December, Yitzhak Rabin visited Oman, the first Gulf state to receive an Israeli prime minister. Several months later, Yossi Beilin, the deputy foreign minister, visited Oman and announced two agreements. The first grants El Al fly-over rights in Oman's air space. The second allows Israel and Oman to cooperate in water desalination projects.

Formal diplomatic ties, however, remain elusive. Last February, Foreign Minister Shimon Peres discussed this question with his Omani counterpart, Yussuf Ben-Allawi, but no decision was taken. Four months ago, Beilin claimed the two nations were moving toward this objective. But since then, nothing more has been heard.

It's clear that Oman is the reluctant party. Analysts believe Oman will resist formal links until Israel reaches a peace accord with Syria and fleshes out the Declaration of Principles with the PLO. (Indeed, Qatar recently cancelled Peres' planned visit to Doha, the capital.)

Qatar is playing the same game, but appears interested in selling natural gas to Israel. In the meantime, Qatar has closed its Arab boycott office, according to the American Jewish Committee.

It's not surprising. Last September, the Gulf Cooperation Council — consisting of Oman, Qatar, Kuwait, Bahrain, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates — lifted the secondary and tertiary economic boycott against Israel. But the primary boycott appears firmly entrenched.

There is no evidence so far of substantive Israeli contacts with the other members of the Gulf Cooperation Council. Yet Israel has opened what may be a fruitful dialogue with Mauritania, a poor country lying on the western edge of Africa.

Last month, in a meeting in Madrid arranged by Spain, the Israeli and Mauritanian foreign ministers met for the first time. Mauritania expressed support for the goal of Middle East peace and voiced an interest in agricultural cooperation.

In terms of geo-politics, Mauritania is hardly a glittering prize. But for Israel, every step forward ultimately counts and improves its chances of normalizing relations with the Arab world.

Judging by a survey conducted by Hilal Khashan of the American University of Beirut, the process will be a hard and long one. In the latest edition of the Washington-based Middle East Quarterly, Khashan found that while most Arabs now accept formal peace negotiations and treaties with Israel, they continue to harbor strong antagonism toward Israel and its people.

Khashan's conclusions are borne out by facts on the ground. Israel has signed peace agreements with Egypt (1979) and Jordan (1994), but many Egyptians and Jordanians are resistant to normalization.

The idea of peace hasn't really trickled down to the masses.

(Please see related story on the Khashan survey in the Everywhere pages.)

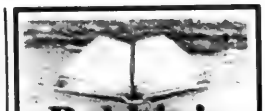
We accept Jewish children from all backgrounds. Give the gift of knowledge - no previous knowledge required!

Due to the overwhelming success of this past year's program we will be expanding to a second time and date:
* Sunday morning or Wednesday evening classroom programs once a week
* Limited space for learning disabled children under the direct supervision of a certified Special Education Specialist
* Private sessions for Bar/Bat Mitzvah preparation are included at NO additional charge
* Junior Shabbat Services
* B'nai Brith Youth Group Chapter
* Field trips

Space is limited - Open house registration - August 20, 10:30 a.m. at the Pride of Israel Synagogue, 59 Lissom Cres., Willowdale

Call the Synagogue office for more information at 226-0111 and ask for Susan.



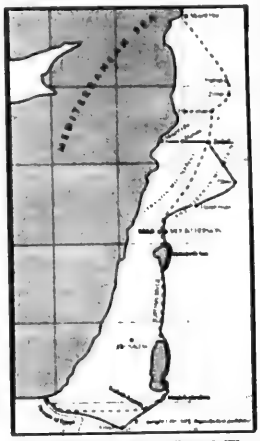
Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI REUVEN M. TRADBURKS

It has become popular in our times to visit the city of Petra in Jordan. However, in spite of Petra's status as part of the modern country of Jordan, it may well be a part of Eretz Yisrael, the biblical land of Israel.

The definition as to what qualifies as Eretz Yisrael is an interesting subject. The borders of the State of Israel are not the borders of Eretz Yisrael of Tanach. Eretz Yisrael is what is commonly referred to in political circles as the "Greater Land of Israel." Whatever land is defined as Eretz Yisrael will determine which lands have the mitzvot of truma and maaser, various other agricultural mitzvot, the Sabbatical year and the shmitta year, as well as the much more politically pregnant issue of which lands we have an obligation to settle and control.

There is a famous opinion of the Ramban, Nachmanides, that states that there are two mitzvot in regard to settling the land of Israel: a mitzvah to live in the land and a mitzvah to have political dominion over the land. If a Jew were to live in the land of Israel while under Turkish rule or Arab rule he would be fulfilling the mitzvah to live in the land but would not be fulfilling the mitzvah to have dominion over the land. There is an opinion in Halachah that when one merely walks four cubits (six feet) in the land of Israel one is fulfilling at least a little bit of dwelling in the land.



The borders of Eretz Yisrael. The two sets of lines indicate two traditional schools of thought on the precise location of the borders. (Reprinted from The Stone Edition Chumash with permission of Mesorah Publications, Ltd.)

Hence, if Petra is part of Eretz Yisrael, one fulfils a little bit of dwelling in the land while touring that city. It would also mean that we ought to aspire to fulfil the mitzvah of ruling over Petra and all of Eretz Yisrael, including much of Jordan and Lebanon (as if we don't have enough tzuris ruling over what we have already).

In turn, the Golan Heights and the city of Eilat both are involved in the issue of defining Eretz Yisrael. Eilat is clearly outside the borders of the land as described in this parshah. The Golan seems questionable: How you draw the lines between cities will determine if the Golan is part of the land.

Rav Kook ruled that the Golan has the halachic status of a doubt, a safek; hence we ought to apply the regular rule concerning doubts. For Torah laws we are strict, while for rabbinic we are lenient. Hence for the mitzvah of settling the land, which is a Torah law, we ought to be strict and assume the Golan to be part of Israel, while for many of the agricultural laws, which are rabbinic in nature, we may be lenient and assume it is not part of the land.

As to the definition of Eretz Yisrael, we assume that the lands which were conquered on the east bank of the Jordan are part of the Land of Israel, of Eretz Yisrael, but do not share the same holiness, the kedushah, the place of the Shechinah (the sense of the Divine Presence), as the Land of Israel on the west side of the Jordan.

While travelling in Petra, one may be fulfilling the mitzvah of dwelling in the greater Eretz Yisrael if just for a moment, but one does not benefit from the sense of the Shechinah, the closeness to the Divine Presence that Eretz Yisrael of the West Bank exhibits.

May we all merit to fulfil all the mitzvot of the land personally and to experience the closeness of the Shechinah that makes it the Holy Land.

Halitza shoe part of museum

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The recently opened Bata Shoe Museum in downtown Toronto boasts an eclectic collection of footwear from Innuit animal skin boots to Chinese silk shoes for bound feet to Victorian dancing slippers to a patent leather shoe worn by Elvis Presley.

It also has a halitza shoe.

Halitza is the seldom seen ceremony by which the brother of a man who died without issue is excused from his halachic obligation to marry the widow.

It is based on instructions given in the Book of Deuteronomy, 25: 5-6, which say that he is obligated to provide an heir "so that his [the deceased brother's] name is not blotted out of Israel."

If he can't or won't marry the widow (and in these days such a marriage does not take place, explains Rabbi Mordechai Ochs, head of the Beth Din of the Vaad Harabonim of Greater Toronto) halitza must be performed.

In the presence of a beth din of three rabbis as well as several others who sit as silent witnesses, the man puts on a shoe, made especially for this purpose, and declares his refusal to marry the widow. She then removes the shoe from his foot and spits on the ground in front of him (not, as popular folklore sometimes has it, in his face).

Those present declare Halutz hana'al (loosely, the halitza shoe has been removed), and express the wish that "the daughters of Israel shall have no need to resort to either halitza or levirate marriage."

While Jews who are not acquainted with the ceremony may find it difficult to accept, Rabbi Ochs explained that "it fulfills the needs of the deceased. His soul can find peace."

The Toronto Beth Din has a set of halitza shoes to accommodate those who are right or left-footed. The right shoe was inherited from Rabbi Yosef Weinreb, the first East European rabbi in the city. A left shoe was later specially constructed.

The shoe at the Bata Museum is made of brown leather, with beige sueded-leather thongs. Curator Jonathan Walford told The CJN that it was purchased at a Christie's Judaica auction in New York about 12 years ago.

Although the provenance (background) of the shoe is sketchy ("it is the practice of auction houses not to divulge too much information about the source of their consignments," Walford said dryly,) it is known that it was the property of a Polish-American rabbi who brought it with him at the turn of the century when he emigrated to New York.

Walford believes it probably dates from the late 18th century.

The museum, a five-story, 3,665 square metre (over 39,000 square foot) structure designed by renowned Toronto architect Raymond Moriyama, contains almost 10,000 pieces spanning 4,500 years of history in its permanent collection. It was just awarded a 1995 City of Toronto Urban Design Award.

Jewish Life

A place of justice

By MARILYN GOLDFARB

During the Great Depression, when I was 8, I went to the non-sectarian international children's camp. My mother somehow scraped together the $3 to pay for my two-week stay.

That camp was later bought by the United Jewish People's Order which had evolved from the Jewish Assistance Social Organization, a progressive Jewish organization whose aim was to give children of working class families an opportunity to enjoy country life in the summer. Those who could not afford to pay anything were accepted without charge.

GUEST VOICES

The children who came to camp were mostly the offspring of trade union workers. Their parents worked in sweatshops and barely eked out a living.

The camp was situated on Fourteen Island Lake, three miles from Shawbridge, in the Laurentian Mountains north of Montreal. It wasn't really a camp, just an old country house that was built close to the main road. The downstairs was made into a big dining room which had two long tables with benches on either side.

The children and the counsellors slept upstairs in a dormitory. I remember that there were not enough cots and the counsellor said the youngest girl could sleep with her in the one double bed. Since I was the smallest she assumed I was the youngest and she picked me. I was thrilled.

But then Clara Buhay spoke up and said she was younger. So she got into the double bed. I was so disappointed that I bent over and bit Clara. Everyone looked at me in horror and I saw that I had lost favor with this group.

Clara was the daughter of Michael Buhay, who later became an alderman and was very popular in the progressive movement as an ardent fighter for peace, justice and better living conditions for working people.

One event I remember from my first stay at the camp was the time the campers were asked to gather little stones to place around a plaque to be unveiled the following Sunday on visitors' day. This was to honor Sacco and Vanzetti, two Italian immigrants who were accused of killing a paymaster and his guard near Boston and were executed in 1927. Many people believed they were convicted because they were philosophical anarchists, not because of the evidence.

Another incident took place one evening when we were supposed to be sleeping but instead were talking to each other. We heard a commotion outside and we ran over to the window and saw a car stop and a few men jump out. They shouted, "Jews get out." Then they threw fire torches at our camp. We got very frightened, but the counsellor calmed us down and we went to sleep. There were several more acts of violence and anti-Semitism against the camp that summer.

The next chance I got to go to camp was when I was 13. The camp was now called Kinderland (later it became Beaver Camp).

The camp had moved to the opposite side of the site and had built eight or 10 individual bungalows, each accommodating eight campers plus a counsellor. A separate dining room doubled as a recreational hall.

Activities planned for the children at camp mostly pertained to progressive causes and ideology, focusing on Jewish culture but not on religion.

At 16, I went to the adult camp, a five-minute walk from the children's camp. It had changed its name to the Laurentian Vacation Club and embraced people of all ages from many different walks of life. There were CCFers, left-wingers, union people, Hashomer Hatzair, and people just looking for an inexpensive holiday.

The camp was a hub of activity; on weekends it was overcrowded and people slept on porches or doubled up with friends in a single cot or anywhere they could.

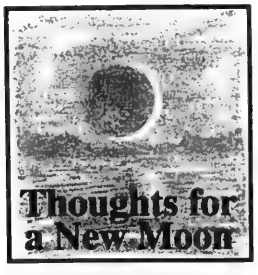
One summer, the Laurentian Vacation Club hired a couple called Luba and Myer Eisenberg from New York as the social directors. They put on plays by Sholem Aleichem in Yiddish and recited poetry by famous Jewish poets.

The camp attracted people because it was reasonable and a haven for teenaged, middle-aged and older campers. Everyone mingled and there was something to do every evening: bingo, vaudeville night, bonfires and singing, concerts and dances. It was a wonderful way to spend time in the country in the summer. There was a sense of justice, compassion, comradeship and cultural identity with these people, perhaps stronger than one would find anywhere else.

I look back with fond memories at both camps at Fourteen Island Lake. I'm sure most people recall the good times they enjoyed there, where one could embrace progressive people in a pleasant atmosphere.

The camps were sold in 1963 for the mere sum of $35,000, including the land. The buildings were torn down and today the area is all overgrown with grass and weeds. Where once there was love and laughter, culture and creativity, there is now a vast emptiness.

Huldah's message equally true



By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

The month of Av is beginning and with it all our attention turns to the ninth day, the day on which both Temples in Jerusalem were destroyed.

For a chronicle of the destruction of Jerusalem in the sixth century BCE, we have biblical accounts, both prophetic and poetic. The prophet Jeremiah foretells the disaster about to befall the Jews and the book of Lamentations portrays the tragedy after-the-fact in its haunting poetry.

There is, however, another warning of these events in Kings II. According to this account, King Josiah finds a book of the Bible which plunges him into despair and foreboding. Based on the contents of this book, Josiah fears that doom is imminent, since it is clear that the Israelites have transgressed severely against God.

In Chapter 22, Josiah orders that a messenger be sent to seek the word of God as to whether the punishment can be averted. The messenger goes to consult with Huldah, a woman who is named as the prophetess residing in Jerusalem. She confirms Josiah's fear that Jerusalem will be destroyed and the people will be punished. However, since Josiah has spent his life reforming Israel and did in fact seek out God, the disaster would be delayed until after his death so that he need not witness these events.

It is clear that the prophecy of Huldah is a concise form of the prophecy of Jeremiah. In fact, the rabbis of the Talmud and the midrash state that Huldah and Jeremiah were prophets living in the same generation. They draw parallels between these characters to the point of attributing to them a common ancestry.

The rabbis then ask why the king would seek out the prophecy of a woman when the prophecy of Jeremiah was also available. Their answer is based on an unstated assumption. The rabbis say that Josiah hoped the prophecy of a woman would be less severe than that of a man, given her female leaning toward compassion.

Yet the Bible has shown us that this underlying assumption is not true. The decree pronounced by Huldah is as severe and horrific as that detailed by Jeremiah.

It appears then, that there is a lesson to be found in Kings II. Josiah had two prophets available to him at that moment. He chose to consult with the prophetess Huldah for reasons unknown. Is it not possible that the reasons are not stated since there is no need for the text to justify his choice? The Book of Kings, reflecting our earliest traditions, shows us that prophecy, truth and morality stand on their own merits. We are to learn and accept words of wisdom from whatever source they may come. Huldah and Jeremiah were expressing the same truths, the same concerns, and ultimately the same sentence was pronounced. The words of prophet and prophetess are equally meaningful as long as these truths lead us inward — toward our people, ourselves and our God.

Chabad House set for Hamilton

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Jewish students at McMaster University will have a Chabad House this fall.

Rabbi Zalman Itkin, a Chabad Lubavitch shaliach at McMaster for over 17 years, recently announced that a house purchased by Chabad Lubavitch adjacent to the campus will serve as a Jewish student centre.

Chabad operates about 30 student centres in North America, including one at the University of Western Ontario in London, and one at McGill University in Montreal.

The goal is to reach out to Jewish students, regardless of affiliation, said Rabbi Itkin.

"We are not running a shul," he stressed. The important thing is that the students recognize themselves as Jews.

Chabad's aim, he said, is to reach out to young Jewish students, especially first-year students who "find themselves in a non-Jewish environment for the first time, to provide them with a Jewish atmosphere and contact with other Jews, and to bring them closer to the [local] Jewish population."

With a growing Jewish student population at McMaster, it was becoming obvious, he said, that a drop-in centre was needed. A student questionnaire, especially from those living off campus, confirmed this.

When 25 students came for a Shabbat dinner at the Itkin home, he knew it was time to act.

Rabbi Itkin and his wife Faigie, a teacher at the Hamilton Hebrew Academy who's also been running a Jewish studies group for women for 13 years, will serve as co-directors.

The centre will be known as Beit Menachem Jewish Student Centre, in honor of the late Lubavitcher Rebbe, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson.

Located at 177 Sterling St., the Tudor-style house has a living room, dining room and downstairs recreation room capable of comfortably seating about 100 people. A student lounge will contain a collection of Jewish reference material and computer and video facilities.

Kosher meals at reasonable prices and Friday night Shabbat dinners will be available and there will be educational, holiday and social programs.

The student centre will also house the Chabad Lubavitch of Hamilton office, where Rabbi Itkin will be available for support and counselling.

He did not disclose the purchase price, but the total cost, he said, will be $300,000 — "and we're more than halfway to our goal. Our objective is not to have to carry a mortgage, but if anyone wants to contribute, they're welcome."

Plans are for the centre to open in September.

Students entering McMaster University this fall can contact Rabbi Itkin at 87 Westwood Ave., Hamilton, Ont. L8S 2B1; telephone 905-529-7458 or 905-526-7898; Fax: 905-528-0505.

Gene mutation linked to cancer

MONTREAL — McGill University researchers have discovered two mutations of the gene linked to breast and ovarian cancer that appear to be peculiar to Ashkenazi Jewish women.

The finding may offer a greater chance of earlier detection of the disease in those carrying the gene. It has certainly excited the researchers who believe this is a significant advance in understanding the role genetics play in certain cancers.

The discovery, based on research here in Montreal with Jewish families, is published in the July issue of the American Journal of Human Genetics.

What it means for Ashkenazi women who worry that they may be predisposed to breast or ovarian cancer because their mother or a sister had the disease is that they could be tested for these two mutations, said Dr. David Rosenblatt, director of the medical genetics division of McGill's department of medicine.

If they carry one of them, they would be advised to be followed up regularly. However, if they have not inherited one of these mutations, it does not necessarily mean they do not carry some other mutation, Rosenblatt noted.

The identification of a breast-ovarian cancer gene, known as BRCA1, was announced only last October by University of Utah researchers, after contributions from several schools, including McGill.

There are believed to be many mutations of the gene, Rosenblatt said, but the knowledge that Ashkenazim are prone, if not subject only to, two of these mutations makes it more feasible to conduct DNA-based testing. Only one non-Jew is known to have one of the Ashkenazi mutations.

Because there are so many mutations, it's too expensive to test every susceptible woman for all of them, he said. When narrowed down to two likely ones, doctors can test Ashkenazi women with a family history of cancer for these at least.

The McGill researchers made their discovery working with patients at the Montreal General and Royal Victoria hospitals.

האזין :

"דאוין הוא דבר שנעשה רק בשביל

הרושם החיצוני ואין לו ערך של ממש "

(מילון אבטיח השימושי)

באחד מערבי הקיץ ישבתי עם חברים ואחד מהם אמר את הדברים הבאים, אותם אני בוחר להביא כלשונם : " מאז שהיגענתי לקנדה אני פוגש פה המון ישראלים שעושים פה עבודות משוטות שלא היו מעיזים לעשות בארץ. רבים מהם לא עושים כאן כלום לאורך תקופות ארוכות. אבל מה, לפני שהם נוסעים לארץ לחופשה הם מפוצצים סכומים אדירים של כסף לקנות מתנות ולעשות דאוין שהולך להם ושהם אנשים חשובים." עד כאן החבר. לפני שנים התפרסם סיפור קצר בעברית על שתי אחיות זקנות, האחת חיה בתל אביב והשניה בניו-יורק הן בקושי דיברו ביניהן, אך היו שולחות זו לזו חבילות , יענו להראות שהן מבוססות ושטוב להן ושהן תומכות האחת בשניה. לימים נפטרה האחות בניו-יורק וזו שבישראל נסעה לארה"ב לסיים את ענייני הירושה. בביתה הדל של אחותה חמתה היא מצאה קבלה של בית משכון והלכה לשם. ראה אותה האיש בבית המשכון אליו הביאה את הקבלה ואמר לה : " אה, זו הגברת הזקנה שהיתה באה כל פעם עם חבילה של דברים מוזרים שקיבלה מישראל והיתה מחליפה אותם פה במתנות כדי לשלוח הזרה לשם". ממש אותו דאוין. האם זו מחלה יהודית -ישראלית שמרכז הענין הוא הרצון לעשות רושם, להיראות חשוב, להיחשב חזק? או שמא זו תכונה אוניברסאלית שקיימת אצל מהגרים מכל העולם ואנחנו פשוט יותר רגישים כאשר זה קורה לישראלים? תחשבו על זה : כמה דברים שאנחנו עושים הם בשביל הדאוין? חבית הגדול מידי שקשה לנו לשלם עליו, אבל הוא נועד להרשים מישהוא (משפחה? חברים?) . בר המצווה למאות אנשים או החתונה לאלף איש, שנמשיך לשלם עליהם שנים, רק כדי לעשות רושם על מישהוא? נכון, גם כל אלה שאנחנו מנסים להרשים משתתפים באותו משחק ומשקיעים כספים וזמן ואנרגיה ממש באותה צורה. תגידו : מה אפשר לעשות, זה שם המשחק החברתי, - או שאתה משתתף או שלא. לא בהכרח ! אפשר גם אחרת! אני מכיר הרבה אנשים צנועים שחיים אחרת ולא בוקע לחם. אבל מה - שינוי ראש וה דבר קשה ! תחשבו על זה.

משל האוסד :

וזכרים את האוסד ? והו חשיח הקוצני שהסכים למלך על העצים אחרי שכל חבריו הטובים - עצי הפרי והגפן - סירבו לעשות זאת . וכצפוי - היה שלטונו כישלון מחפיר וחסתיים בשריפה גדולה. יותם , שסיפר את המשל לפני שלושת אלפים שנה ידע כבר אז את מה שלומדים כולנו על בשרינו : פוליטיקאים רבים אינם בוחרים בפוליטיקה מתוך כישוריהם הטובים, מתוך אהבת אנשים או מתוך יכולתם לתרום לקדמת האדם. בחירתם נעשית לעתים קרובות מתוך שיקולים של כבוד, כוח ולעתים אף בצע כסף. עם השנים יצא לפוליטיקה שם רע כל כך, שרבים וטובים שהיו מוכנים לשקול מסלול קאריירה כזה נבהלים ומוותרים. וכך יוצא שעניינינו החשובים ביותר, לעתים החלטות גדולות של מלחמה או רווחה כלכלית, מנוטים ומוחלטים על ידי ה"אוסד" התורן. אבל מה - מגיע לנו ! כל זמן שהטובים יותר לא יבחרו במסלול פוליטי, נקבל את האוסד, או כמו שג'ורג' וושינגטון אמר : "לכל עם יש את הממשלה שהוא ראוי לה ". אין ספק ששאיפותיו של פוליטיקאים מתרחשות בכל העולם, ובכל זאת - חלב כואב למראה המציאות הישראלית : עבריין יהודי צרפתי נמלט לישראל וכדי להגן על עצמו מהסגרה לצרפת הוא מצליח להיבחר לכנסת (פלאטו שרון). שר וחבר כנסת של מפלגה דתית עומד למשפט על עבירות חמורות ביותר ואינו מוצא לנכון להתפטר לא מהממשלה ולא מהכנסת. אחרי שראש הממשלה מכריח אותו להתפטר הוא מתמרן את מפלגתו אל מחוץ לקואליציה ועוד ממשיך משפטו - הוא ממשיך לכהן כחבר כנסת (דרעי) . רק לשם השוואה : שרת הבריאות של אונטריו ענתה בפרלמנט על שאילתה בעניין הכסף שעלה למשלם המסים חטיפול בנרקומן מסוים שהוטס לארה"ב. עוד היא ענתה על השאילתה נפלט מפיה בטעות שמו של הנרקומן. עוד באותו יום חיא התפטרה מן הממשלה ! ממש הבדל של יום ולילה.

ייעוץ כוח :

אם אתם רוצים לדעת מדוע מדינה זו או אחרת מצליחה לקדם את רמת תושביה, הן מבחינה כלכלית והן מבחינת רווחה חברתית, כדאי לכם להתעניין כמה מבחינה כלכלית והן מבחינת רווחה חברתית, כדאי לכם להתעניין כמה מהתקציב שלה מוקצה לחינוך. חשבתו התפרסם שהמדינה היחידה בעולם שמקציבה יותר מ- 9% מהתוצר הגולמי שלה לחינוך היא... ישראל. אחריה באות מדינות כמו קנדה, שוודיה, וכאלה עשירות. הנתון הזה לבדו איננו מתאר את גודל החישג, כי בארץ והרבה יותר מאשר כאן למשל, מקובל שחורים משקיעים גם סכומי עתק בתוגי הַעֲשָׂרָה ושעורים פרטיים, לחבטיח שהילד לא יפגר אחרי רמת הכיתה. הסכומים האלה לא נכללו בסטטיסטיקה של ה- 9% . מרחיב את הלב !

Anti-Semitic letter condemned by Jews, Poles

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Canadian Polish Congress (CPC) has joined Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) in condemning an anti-Semitic letter that appeared in a Polish-language newspaper published in Toronto.

"I think the letter is scandalous and shouldn't have appeared," said Marek Malicki, president of CPC.

"The content [of the letter] is despicable, gutter anti-Semitism and garbage," said Moshe Ronen, chair of the Ontario region of CJC.

While both organizations criticized the Gazeta for running the letter, both leaders agreed they would not let it sour relations between the two communities.

The letter was discussed by officials of the two organizations at a meeting recently. Also on the agenda were discussions about Nazi war criminals and Canadian national unity — issues on which the two groups see eye-to-eye.

A news release issued by CJC said the organizations "reaffirmed their commitment to work toward eliminating anti-Semitism and hateful comments about ethnocultural communities in the media."

Malicki said he had issued a communique and held a news conference that was reported in the Gazeta and both "referred to my concerns about anti-Semitism."

The letter, which took up most of a page in the tabloid-sized Gazeta, described by Malicki as "the most widely-read Polish paper," was titled In the Shadow of the Jewish Hat.

It opens by claiming that Jews are the "main engine" of the Canadian economy and that "they never do anything with their own money but always with ours or the government's, which is also ours. They take their own money, which they never earn honestly, out of the country to Israel, Switzerland."

The letter, which is mostly incoherent, rambling and bitter, accuses the Jews of having "studied with Goebbels [the Nazi propaganda minister] himself" to fool the public with lies.

Ronen said the fact that such a letter was published "is telling about how that paper is run." He said CJC "did not feel it would be productive to pursue an avenue directly with the newspaper."

Malicki said he spoke with the editor and "I requested that no similar letters appear." Noting that the paper is independent, Malicki said, "I have no authority over the editor."

Malicki suggested that the public dialogue involving Jews and Poles was getting out of hand and he referred to a letter about the Warsaw Ghetto uprising, which was published in the Toronto Star and offended Poles.

Ronen said Jewish/Polish history has to be addressed honestly and without recourse to racist remarks.

The CJN's call to Gazeta was not returned.

Polish payments protested by Sobolewski's group

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Protests against the payment of the equivalent of $18,000 by the Polish government to a man who was part of a unit that rounded up and murdered 12 Jews in May 1944, will be held before the Polish consulates in Ottawa, Toronto, Vancouver, Chicago and New York.(CJN, June 29)

In making this announcement, Sigmund Sobolewski, a Catholic survivor of Auschwitz, said the Auschwitz Awareness Society, has received no official response from the Polish government to their request for an explanation of the payment.

Two other accomplices of Stefan Wyszkowski in the 1944 case have also applied for compensation under 1991 legislation, Sobolewski said.

Convictions against the three were overturned by a Polish court because of "their activities to secure the independence of the Polish state," he said. Wyszkowski later claimed damages for a five-year sentence that was imposed on him in 1952 and he was awarded 308 million Polish zlotys.

A letter from a Polish government official to an interested observer of the case claims that the payment was not related to Wyszkowski's connection with the 1944 case, but Sobolewski says this contradicts a statement given him by the director of the Minister of Justice office.

Sobolewski said on a recent visit to Warsaw he was assured by the office manager of the Minister of Justice that the protest would not be ignored and an official communique would be issued.

He distributed 400 leaflets in three Polish cities protesting the payment. Later, as an official observer, he requested the Intenational Auschwitz Council to protest the compensation, but the chairman said it was outside the Council's jurisdiction.

Jewish Agency in 'critical shape:' Hadassah boss

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The Jewish Agency (JA) is in "critical shape" financially and this will seriously affect Youth Aliyah programs of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO, says Judy Mandleman, national president.

Mandleman returned recently from the annual JA assembly in Jerusalem, which she attended as the sole Canadian representative of a six-member WIZO delegation.

She said Avraham Burg, the new JA chair, told the WIZO delegates that Youth Aliyah projects in which the Agency participates, will be slashed financially by at least 10 per cent and WIZO will have to try and pick up the slack.

Affected by the budget cuts will be the schools supported by WIZO. One new program which brings young Jews from former Soviet Union countries to study in Israel, with the option of becoming olim, will be cut back "and that's really a shame," said Mandleman.

The cost of bringing the students is $7,800 (US) each per year. It had been hoped to bring at least 2,500 kids but that goal will likely be cut to 1,000.

Mandleman said there will be a cutback of hundreds of other children admitted to Youth Aliyah schools and fewer teachers will be employed, as budgets are chopped.

Other JA programs will be slashed or dropped, Burg told the assembly, but he gave no details. One plan that is fairly certain is to combine the operations of the World Zionist Organization with the Jewish Agency and this will likely be effected next year. A resolution covering this was approved by the assembly.

The JA financial problem is due to lower contributions from the Diaspora, Mandleman reported. To alleviate this situation, a resolution was passed insisting that at least 50 per cent of funds raised through campaigns of the United Jewish Appeal in the United States, United Israel Appeal (Keren Hayesod), which operates worldwide, and the various federations be allocated to the Jewish Agency.

Mandleman said that while Israel's economy is booming, this doesn't help the Jewish Agency and there are still a great many disadvantaged Israelis, especially children, who have been helped by Youth Aliyah. The government, she said, doesn't help them.

Mandleman said Canadian Hadassah-WIZO is planning a series of regional conferences to discuss next year's programs and to plan for the next century.

Students, seniors mingle at intergenerational tea

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The gym buzzed with the children's chatter as they set banquet tables covered with blue and pink cloths for the recent intergenerational tea at North York's Pleasant Public School.

There were painted murals on the gym walls and vases of fresh carnations on every table.

The tea was a culmination of an intergenerational pen-pal program now in its sixth year, which matches students in a Grade 4/5 class with seniors connected with Senior Care, an agency offering home support and counselling services to seniors in the community.

Pairs of individual children and seniors had been corresponding since the fall, exchanging some four letters. They finally met each other at the spring tea.

According to school principal, Vivian Shapiro, the annual tea "is one of the most anticipated events at Pleasant School."

Just before 1 p.m., most of the Grade 4/5 class filed into the gym and sat at their designated tables. The children assigned to escort the seniors to their tables paced in the lobby waiting for their guests.

The program is the brainchild of Arnold Foss, supervisor of volunteer programs at Senior Care and Patti Durkes, a Grade 4/5 teacher at Pleasant. The two met seven years ago when Durkes was a homemaking coordinator at Senior Care. She told The CJN the work sensitized her to the needs of the elderly, and when she returned to teaching, she wanted to involve her students in an intergenerational program.

"I learned so much from them [the seniors] I thought it would be an extremely valuable learning experience for the kids," Durkee said. "We came up with the [pen-pal] idea together," she said. "We wanted to involve the clients who were homebound ... Letter writing was the ideal tool because it also offered the students an educational component."

Foss, the link between the seniors and the students — there are about 60 participants a year — recruits clients and volunteers at Senior Care and follows up when necessary to keep them involved.

Some of the students have lost their pen-pals as a result of death, which is very upsetting to them Durkes said. "They usually cry and we talk about the natural circle of life."

But she said the most tears shed over a senior in her class had nothing to do with death or illness. "The senior didn't show up, she just didn't come to the tea. The student cried the whole time. She was devastated. The seniors don't realize how excited the kids are to meet them."

The tea was in full swing by 1:30 p.m. All the seniors had arrived and were seated with their pen-pals, chatting over cake and cookies, and exchanging small gifts.

Some pairs, like author Ibolya Grossman and Grade 5 student Jill Edelstein, pen-pals for two years, greeted each other with hugs.

"The nicest thing is to receive the children's letters, to hear what they have to say," said Grossman, who has been with the program for five years.

"The children have a lot of questions. Like Michael, my first pen pal, asked me to tell him about the war [World War II] and why people were fighting." She said she explained about Hitler in simple terms and suggested that he continue the discussion with his parents.

"The kids are wonderful," Bessie Coopersmith said. "I tell them about my life. They tell me about their life. I have grandchildren, but they're old, so it's nice to be in touch with these kids."

Speaking to an audience of 80, Grades 5 student Arash Saniemoosavi called Sophie Richmond, his pen-pal of two years "a good friend." He said, "I feel like I met her whole family through her letters."

Remembering Lenkinski on his shloshim

By BEN KAYFETZ
Special to The CJN

Louis (Eliezer) Lenkinski, who died on June 20, lived up to the highest ideals of Jewish life, thought, and values.

His active life was guided by the principle of what he could do to improve the condition of his fellow humans, to raise and fulfil their aspirations. He left his life in the very midst of these actions, not completing his work, yet in no way reducing or diminishing his load.

Lenkinski was a product of the city of Lodz, the industrial city of Poland. For those who never lived in Eastern Europe they need only recollect or dip into the pages of I. J. Singer's novel The Brothers Ashkenazi to get a picture of this thriving, bustling metropolis where Pole, Jew and German vied for livelihood, where Jews from the unchanging shtetlach confronted the at-first alien influences of the worlds of enlightenment, revolt and liberation that came in so many different and often overlapping forms: Zionism, haskalah, socialism, democracy — sometimes veering towards nationalism and at other times to assimilation.

Bund was a way of life

Lenkinski's field of activity was determined early in his life, and he never deviated from it. While still a youngster, he chose the Bundist option despite his father's objection.

In Poland between the wars, the Bund — which in two years will mark its centenary — was more than a political party in the Sejm. It was a philosophy, a way of life, with its own summer camps, youth groups, loan and sick funds, newspapers, health centres and hospitals and school system.

After the war and the liberation, he met his wife Helen; they were brought to Canada by the Jewish Labor Committee and settled in Toronto.

In his new life, he resumed the values and priorities of his previous career, learning the upholsterer's craft, joining its union and soon representing that union at various trade union councils. He became an official in the Toronto Labor Council and an executive of the Ontario Federation of Labor.

Living up to the best traditions of the Bund, he avoided sectarianism and, believing in Klal Yisrael, participated in all that was constructive in the Jewish community. He lent his experience to the social policy committee of the former United Jewish Welfare Fund, was an officer of Canadian Jewish Congress and eventually became the Ontario chair of the Congress community relations committee, the agency devoted to the defence and security of the Jewish community.

Though not a Zionist ideologically, Lenkinski felt the integral Jewish tie to Israel and was in no way lukewarm or indifferent to its needs and interests.

Lenkinski maintained his ties with the Jewish Labor Committee and the Workmen's Circle and Yiddish cultural enterprises. In the midst of all his obligations, he contributed a column to the New Fraternals on political and labor union themes. He keenly followed the events in the new Poland and was in close personal touch with the men and women behind Lech Walesa in their efforts to restore political decency to that land.

Lenkinski was not affiliated with a synagogue but observed the still valid maxim about religion being a private matter. He worked closely with rabbis of all nuances and with Rabbi Dow Marmur established the Polish-Jewish Heritage to build bridges to the Polish community.

Lenkinski might be called a secular Jew. If so, he was a secular Jew in the highest and best sense of expression. Certainly, he left a heritage and role model that Jews both secular and spiritual might emulate to everyone's advantage.

May his memory be for a blessing!

Flyers pick up Sokolsky in NHL entry draft

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It was getting late in the day and Jamie Sokolsky wasn't quite sure if his ears were playing tricks on him or he'd actually heard his name being called on the Edmonton Coliseum PA system.

Turning to his uncle, Zeev Werek, he got the confirmation he'd been waiting for. Yes, he could believe his ears — he'd been chosen by the Philadelphia Flyers in the sixth round of the National Hockey League entry draft, 135th overall.

"It was a pretty long wait but when I heard my name called, I was really happy," the 18-year-old Belleville Bulls defenceman said.

Heading down to the Philly table, Sokolsky was greeted by a host of Hall-of-Famers, including GM Bobby Clarke and scout Bill Barber as well as head coach Terry Murray.

Going to a team that features Hart Trophy winner Eric Lindros and the rest of the Legion of Doom is an intoxicating prospect for the teenage rearguard. "I'm very excited. They're an up and coming team. They're pretty young," Sokolsky said soon after his return from Edmonton.

Still, Sokolsky is not operating under any illusions that he's ready to crack the Phillie lineup. Instead, he's spending the summer in the gym, working out six hours a day with a personal trainer to get himself stronger so he can be better able to play a pro-style game back in junior next season.

At six foot three, 210 lbs, it's unclear how much stronger he needs to be, but at any rate, Sokolsky realizes that in today's NHL, size and strength are held at a premium.

"Last year, I tried to establish myself as a player and I didn't try to be aggressive enough. People told me that during the season, but it didn't sink in until the draft," he said.

Jamie Sokolsky

A projected fourth rounder by Central Scouting, Sokolsky believes his lack of physical play pushed him back to the sixth round. But he says he's learned his lesson and he's determined to make opposition forwards pay the price this year for venturing into the Bulls' end of the ice.

Sokolsky boasts some solid draft year statistics to go along with his new attitude.

During the regular season, he scored four goals and added 18 assists for 22 points to go along with 28 penalty minutes. In 15 playoff games, he picked up the pace, bulging the twine three times and adding nine helpers as Belleville beat North Bay and Kingston before losing to the Guelph Storm.

The past season may have been the breakthrough year in Sokolsky's career. Though he began the campaign in Sarnia, he was traded early on to Belleville. "The situation in Sarnia wasn't working out for me. There were too many players and not enough opportunity," he said.

Coming to Belleville, it took a little while to work himself into the lineup. As the season wore on, his confidence and performance improved so that by the end of the year he was playing a regular shift as well as quarterbacking the power play. An offensive defenceman who likes to join the rush, Sokolsky was chosen most improved player by the Bulls.

In the playoffs, "I pick it up a lot," Sokolsky said, "I'm technically better. Compared to last year I'm much smarter. I picked up the positional part of the game more."

Sokolsky, from the Toronto suburb of Richmond Hill, was accompanied to Edmonton by nine family members, including his parents Mel and Aviva, brothers Matthew and Hillel and uncles Dave Weinberg and Zeev Werek. He's a former student at Beth Tikvah afternoon school.

S.A. rugby star ignores racial slur

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JOHANNESBURG — Joel Stransky, the hero in South Africa's victory over New Zealand in the recent rugby World Cup final, has shrugged off suggestions that his coach was anti-Semitic in referring to him after the match as the "Jew boy."

The fly-half, who kicked all of his team's points, said his coach, Kitch Christie, "often uses 'Jew boy' as a term of endearment, because he and I are very, very close."

Stransky, a restaurateur and a former South African Maccabi Sportsman of the Year, is also known as the "minyan man" because he is the 10th Jew to play for the Springboks, the national team.

In South Africa, a belief exists — especially among rugby-mad Afrikaners, who are often heard chanting "Go, Jood [Jew], go" during matches — that having a Jew on the team is good luck.

Stransky called such a belief a myth, saying: "They say it, but they don't really believe it. I am not superstitious and I don't believe in omens. A player is not picked because he is Jewish, but because he is the best man."

South African Jews joined in nationwide celebrations of the historic World Cup victory over the New Zealand All Blacks, named for the color of their shirts.

But because the match was played on a Saturday, most observant Jews were forced to watch video recordings after Shabbat ended.

Hungarian restitution pact welcomed

Top Jewish officials praise deal

Jewish Telegraphic Ageny

BUDAPEST — Calling the agreement a breakthrough, Jewish leaders have expressed satisfaction with Hungary's official commitment last week to set up procedures for the restitution of Jewish property seized during World War II.

The pact, signed by the Hungarian government, the World Jewish Restitution Organization and local Jewish organizations, calls for the Hungarian Finance Ministry to establish two subcommittees.

One subcommittee will settle the legal and technical aspects of compensation. The other will deal with relevant documentation for claims. A report will be issued by Sept. 30.

Elan Steinberg, executive director of the World Jewish Congress (WJC), said of the pact: "I hope it will serve as a model for the other Central and Eastern European agreements."

Last month, during a visit to New York, Hungarian Prime Minister Gyula Horn presented some proposals concerning the restitution issue to WJC officials.

At that time, Steinberg said all communal property belonging to the Catholic, Lutheran and Calvinist churches and the Jews would be returned.

Similar efforts are under way in other countries in the region, including Poland, the Czech Republic and Slovakia, an official of the restitution group said.

Buenos Aires bombing recalled

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES — More than 40,000 people crowded the streets of Buenos Aires last week to demand that those responsible for last year's bombing of the Jewish community's headquarters be brought to justice.

Exactly one year after the devastating attack, Argentines paid tribute to the 86 Jews who died in the explosion July 18, 1994. Commemorations began last Tuesday, at 9:50 a.m. — the exact time the bomb went off, demolishing the building at 633 Pasteur St.

A crowd of mourners gathered at the devastated site where the Jewish communal headquarters once stood and from a rose-strewn altar the names of the dead were read aloud and a candle lit for each one.

The rally and memorial service were two of dozens of ceremonies across the country. Commemorations were also held around the world.

The anniversary commemoration in Buenos Aires was attended by former Argentine president Raul Alfonsin, Israeli member of Knesset Benny Temkin, Argentine opposition politicians and government ministers and officials.

Reflecting the frustration of the crowd at the lack of progress in the investigation of the attack, Argentine Interior Minister Carlos Corach — himself a Jew — was booed. Argentine President Carlos Menem did not attend.

Ruben Beraja, president of DAIA, the umbrella political organization of the Argentine Jewish community, said although "we have faith in our democratically elected authorities, we have to push them to investigate the bombing and catch the culprits.

"There is suspicion of neo-Nazi complicity, of conspiracies, of anti-Semitic elements blocking the investigation," he said. "We all know that. We talk about it in bars, among friends, off the record. Well, it is time we discussed it openly, to know the truth."

Alberto Crupnicoff, president of AMIA, the community's social service agency and the main occupant of the building destroyed in the attack, sounded a note of resolve: The bomb "did not destroy Jewish life in Argentina. We have a 1,000-year-old experience in rebuilding ourselves and AMIA is functioning again."

One poster in English at the rally attracted particular attention. It read: "President Menem: Oklahoma City Bombing 1995; suspects captured. AMIA Bomb Attack 1994 — No Suspects?"

The demand for justice dominated many of the ceremonies, including one in New York, where the Anti-Defamation League sponsored a memorial service.

Jewish officials in attendance expressed outrage that Argentina sent a low-level diplomat, Juan Louis Garibaldi, deputy consul general of Argentina, to the event. He spoke only briefly, saying that he had nothing official to add about the investigation.

One year after the bombing, the Argentine government's investigation has yielded only four arrests and no conclusive explanation of the bombing.

The Menem government has so far failed to get beyond accusing car dealer Carlos Alberto Telleldin of providing the van used for the car bomb and arresting three others as alleged accomplices. Three of these arrests occurred only recently.

* * *

Those responsible for the attack on the Buenos Aires Jewish headquarters may never be brought to justice, according to a report released last week.

The report, commissioned by the American Jewish Committee, paints a bleak picture of the Argentine government's investigation into the bombing.

The report's author, Argentine journalist Sergio Kiernan, cites lack of will, incompetence and anti-Semitism on the part of Argentine police as factors preventing the apprehension of the culprits.

Congress puts Bosnia on agenda

CJN Staff and Wire Services

North American Jews last week called on their governments' leaders to push for an end to human rights violations in Bosnia and to prosecute war criminals in the conflict.

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) representatives met recently with Foreign Affairs Minister Andre Ouellet and raised the situation in Bosnia, with emphasis on the punishment of war crimes and crimes against humanity.

"The Jewish community of Canada joins with people all over the world who are deeply concerned with the deteriorating situation in Bosnia," CJC president Goldie Hershon said in a statement last week.

"We reiterate our call for a negotiated settlement to the conflict. If that is not possible, then we urge our government to act in coordination with other nations ... to take all needed action to save the civilians whose lives are at risk."

PRESIDENT OF SUPREME COURT

Justice Aharon Barak, 59, was elected president of the Israeli Supreme Court last week. Barak has been on the Supreme Court for 17 years. He succeeds Justice Meir Shamgar.

Arab attitudes to peace shifting: polls

By DAVID H. GOLDBERG

How is the Arab "street" reacting to the prospects of normalized relations with Israel? The March 1994 inaugural issue of Middle East Quarterly published the results of a survey of Arab attitudes conducted immediately following the September 1993 Declaration of Principles (DoP).

ANALYSIS

From the data, Hilal Khashan (of the American University of Beirut) concluded that an overwhelming majority of Arabs rejected outright the concept of peaceful coexistence with Israel or, at a minimum, viewed peace agreements as tactical measures to be adhered to only until the Arabs acquired the resources needed to accomplish the strategic goal of destroying Israel.

However, a follow-up poll by Khashan published in the June 1995 issue of Middle East Quarterly, offers evidence of a possible shift in attitude on the Arab street. On the one hand, there is the continued dream among the Arabs of destroying Israel if this were to become possible. On the other hand, a growing number of respondents recognize the inevitability of Arab governments' negotiating formal peace treaties with Israel.

Two competing interpretations may be applied to these findings. Skeptics will view the Arab street's acceptance of peace settlements with Israel as a reassertion of the traditional "phased process;" i.e. as a way of accommodating adverse regional and global political realities (resulting from the collapse of the Soviet Union and the Gulf War) until the military circumstances again shift to the Arabs' favor. The growing influence of Muslim extremists amongst the Palestinians as well as in Egypt and Lebanon, and the obstacles confronted by the Jordanian regime in forcing the repeal of anti-Israeli legislation through parliament, reinforce concern about the transient quality of the popular readiness to normalize relations with Israel.

On the other hand, it may also be that the changes in attitude suggested by the current poll reflect the first stages of a basic transformation in the way in which Arabs relate to Israel. The noted Israeli military strategist, Yehoshofat Harkabi, suggested a decade ago that real peace will be possible only when Israelis and Arabs come to terms with the unbridgeable gap between what they hope to achieve and what is achievable. In the current context, the Arab street may continue to dream of destroying Israel, but the fact that they are now resigning themselves to their governments signing treaties suggests that the crucial process of re-education has begun.

The data on Arab popular attitudes may also have an important educative effect on Israelis. Clearly, the euphoria generated by the DoP and the peace treaty with Jordan has dissipated and even the most optimistic Israelis now realize that the vision of their country's complete integration into "a new Middle East" is not likely to be transformed into a reality in the foreseeable future. Perhaps the status quo — characterized by incremental progress toward secure peace agreements at the government-to-government level, combined with the continuing hesitation on the Arab street to embrace Israelis in a true "people's peace" — is the most we can realistically hope for, at least until the psychological barriers constructed over decades of hostility begin to dissolve.

Dr. David Goldberg is the director of research for the Foundation for Middle East Studies.

Jewish community caught in middle of Bosnia war

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BELGRADE — As fighting continues to rage in Bosnia, amid threats of more NATO air strikes against Bosnian Serbs, the Jews of neighboring Yugoslavia are doing their best to avoid taking sides in the conflict.

"Of course, we are against the war," Aca Singer, president of the Federation of Jewish Communities in Yugoslavia, said in a recent interview. "But we do not want to support one side or another."

There are 8,000 Jews in the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, today comprised of the republics of Serbia and Montenegro. The two republics were part of the larger Yugoslavia that broke apart in 1991, when the former Yugoslav republics of Croatia, Slovenia, Bosnia and Macedonia declared their independence.

Prior to World War II, some 82,000 Jews lived in the unified Yugoslavia. About 67,000 — some 82 per cent of the community — perished in the Holocaust, leaving 15,000 survivors.

In Serbia and Montenegro alone, 29,000 of the 40,000-strong community were killed.

In Croatia, where followers of a nationalist puppet regime actively fought alongside the Nazis in an effort to destroy Jews and Serbs alike in neighboring Serbia, some 20,000 Jews perished in the notorious Jasenovac concentration camp.

Long-simmering memories of the Croatian atrocities committed during the war have created a bond between Jews and Serbs.

Long-simmering memories

The bond remains strong — despite the fact that most of the world community perceives Serbs as having committed the worst human rights abuses during the fighting in Bosnia.

But Yugoslavia's Jews, playing a delicate game of political acrobatics, avoid pointing fingers at either the Serbs or Muslims.

"There are no good guys or bad guys. It is hard to tell who is more to blame for the present tragedy. They are all guilty," said Singer, 71, a survivor of both Auschwitz and the Communist prisons of the late leader of Yugoslavia, Marshall Tito.

The fall of communism in Yugoslavia has done much to revive the Jewish community. Many Jews who had concealed their religion during the Tito era have come out of hiding.

Jews are openly joining the community because it provides them with a sense of belonging and because they receive financial assistance. That is a strong inducement for some in the current economic situation, made more difficult by the international economic sanctions levied against Belgrade because of its support for the rebel Serbs in Bosnia.

"Every day we admit new members into the community," said Rabbi Yitzhak Assiel, a 31-year-old convert who recently returned to Belgrade after more than six years of rabbinical studies in Israel. "The community has come back to life."

Some 7,000 Yugoslav Jews have made aliyah in recent years. Those who remain are mostly elderly.

Another task facing the Yugoslav Jewish community is preserving the memory of the past.

Almost an entire floor in the Jewish community building is occupied by the Jewish Museum, which has an extensive exhibit of Jewish history in Yugoslavia dating back to the 13th century.

In a building adjacent to the museum, two women sit across from each other at a table and compare notes from a seemingly endless pile of documents.

Each document contains the personal data of a Holocaust victim. The documents are being gathered together to be sent to the Yad Vashem Holocaust Museum in Jerusalem.

It is but another effort to preserve the past in a community that is confronting some grim present-day realities.

July 17:

• Ha'aretz reported that Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin said Israel will insist on administering Rachel's Tomb after full responsibilities in Bethlehem are transferred to the Palestinians. A joint Israeli-Palestinian unit will guard worshipper traffic.

July 18:

• Two yeshivah students, Ohad Bachrach, 18, from Beit El, and Ori Shahor, 20 from Ra'anana, were murdered while hiking in Wadi Kelt, a popular spot between Jerusalem and Jericho. The Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine claimed responsibility for the murders.

• Yediot Aharonot reported that a 24-member delegation from the Shas movement left for a two-day visit to Jordan. The group was scheduled to meet with King Hussein to convey to him a letter from Shas leader Rabbi Ovadia Yosef.

July 19:

• While on a visit to southern Lebanon, President Ezer Weizman indirectly criticized the policies of his government during a discussion of the peace process: "When making fateful decisions on how Israel will look and how we will live, we must aspire for a very wide base of national consensus ... When we signed the peace treaty with Egypt, almost 90 Knesset members supported the agreement ... There should be the same situation with the Syrians and the Palestinians."

July 20:

• Ha'aretz reported that Argentinan Foreign Ministry officials have denied that they are attempting to sell a nuclear reactor to Syria. Rumors of such an attempted sale had been reported and Israeli officials had expressed their concern.

• Yasser Arafat announced the arrest of five suspects – four from Jericho and one from Gaza – in the murders of the two yeshivah students at Wadi Kelt earlier in the week.

July 21 :

• To break a legislative logjam in Washington over future American aid to the Palestinian Authority, Yasser Arafat promised the U.S. Administration and Congress that he would cancel the sections in the Palestine National Covenant calling for the destruction of Israel. The American bill will require the offensive sections to be revoked within a reasonable time after Palestinian elections, failing which, further aid will be withheld.

The Jews of Turkey

A community in transition

CJN staff reporter Paul Lungen recently visited Turkey as part of a group of North American Jewish journalists and organizational leaders, who were guests of the Turkish government and national airline. This is the first in a three-part series about the Jewish community of Turkey.

Rabbi David Aseo

ISTANBUL, Turkey — Like the country that has been its home for the past 500 years, the Jewish community of Turkey has experienced tremendous changes in the 20th century.

From a large and farflung community with outposts across the country, Jewish numbers have been reduced by emigration. Where once the community numbered 82,000 in 1927 (down from Ottoman times), today it has 26,000 members, living primarily in Istanbul (20,000) and Izmir (2,400). Over the course of the century, thousands of mostly impoverished Jews made aliyah to Israel while others moved to Latin America in the quest for better lives.

For those who remained, life has been good, with the Jewish community thriving in the largely tolerant atmosphere bequeathed by Kemal Ataturk, the Turkish republic's first president.

Although its population has been much depleted, today's Jewish community retains the critical mass needed to be able to operate a full range of communal institutions.

The titular head of the community is Rabbi David Aseo, 81, who represents the community to the Turkish government.

There are five rabbis in all of Turkey as well as two pupils studying in rabbinical seminaries in Israel and the United States, Rabbi Aseo told our group. About 500 children in Istanbul attend Jewish school through their teens.

The city is served by 15 synagogues, 12 of which operate year round while another three on the nearby Princess Islands are used by vacationers during the summer.

The oldest synagogue in Istanbul is the Ahrida, located in the Balat area, which dates from the mid-15th century.

Eight shochtim (ritual slaughterers) provide kosher meat and two mohelim serve the community as well.

The community operates a home for the elderly, a hospital and five youth clubs.

Though predominately Sephardi, the Jewish community also has about 1,000 Ashkenazi members, most the descendents of refugees who fled the Russian revolution. They worship at their own shul.

Ladino (Judeo-Spanish) was once the lingua franca of the community but, like Yiddish in North America, it is being abandoned by young people for the Turkish language.

Turkey's Jewish population, we were told, shares some of the same problems experienced in North America. Intermarriage, at about 20 per cent, is considered unacceptably high and it is difficult to find suitable marriage partners in smaller centres.

The community is served by a weekly Jewish newspaper, Shalom, with a circulation of 5,000. Ivo Molinas, its editor, is a businessman and like the other staff, is an unpaid volunteer. "We see this as a Jewish task," he said, explaining that the mandate of the community-owned publication is to inform its readers about the wider Jewish world.

Until 1984, the paper was printed in Ladino, but with the decline in use of that language it was decided to switch to Turkish, boosting it average weekly size to 12 pages.

Jews have reached the highest echelons in a number of spheres of Turkish life, thanks to an absence of official discrimination.

Today, many in the community are businessmen and professionals while others hold prominent university lecturing positions.

"Jews have lived well here in Turkey," said Aron Habib, vice-president of Istanbul's Jewish community. "We have lived here as Sephardim for 500 years when we were received by the Ottoman Empire very nicely."

State-sponsored anti-Semitism is non-existent, though fundamentalist politicians, clerics and writers cause concern among those Jews who follow the political scene.

But Jewish community members in Istanbul and Izmir reassured us time and again that the country's Jews lead a comfortable, safe existence — though they take care to keep a low profile.

In the words of Naim Guleryuz, author of a booklet, The History of the Turkish Jews, "The Jewish community is a smooth community. We don't cause problems to the government."

Unlike their North American cousins, few Jews have entered politics and there are none serving in parliament.

One however, Soli Ozel, is founder of a new political party, the Neo Democracy Movement, which urges negotiations with Kurdish separatists.

While Islamic fundamentalism is a major concern today for leaders of the Jewish community, it was religious intolerance in Christian Europe 500 years ago that gave birth to the lively Jewish community we see today.

In a seminal event in Jewish history, the Sephardi community of Spain was uprooted and evicted after centuries of habitation. At the time of the expulsion in 1492, Sultan Bayazid II dispatched the Ottoman fleet to Spanish waters to protect ships carrying Jews from marauding pirates.

The expulsion coincided with another historic event. At midnight on August 2, 1492, Christopher Columbus was forced to depart for the new world from the relatively unknown port of Palos because the shipping lanes of Cadiz and Seville were clogged with Sephardi Jews fleeing Spain, Guleryuz writes.

The exact numbers who made their way to Turkey is not clear, said Silvia Franko, a professional tour guide in Izmir. Some estimates put the number at 50,000, others at 150,000. Those who fled Spain (and later Portugal) found a tiny community of "Romaniot" Jews already living in the Ottoman Empire. Their history could be traced back to the 1st century Roman era.

The Romaniot Jews were absorbed by the more cultured Sephardi arrivals but their presence testifies to an ancient history.

According to Guleryuz, remnants of Jewish settlement can be traced back to the 4th century BCE in the Aegean (western) region.

At one time, their culture was impressive in its own right. The ruins of the largest synagogue ever constructed can be found in the ancient city of Sardis, about 70 kms east of Izmir. At its height, it measured more than 140 metres long and it "tells you the power the Jews had in the Roman period," Franko said.

The Jewish population declined under the Byzantine Christians, later to be revived by the Sephardi refugees.

At its peak in the 16th and 17th centuries, the Jewish population in the Ottoman Empire, from Vienna to Yemen, reached about 300,000, said Habib. There were centres of Jewish life in Istanbul, Smyrna (today's Izmir), Salonica and Safed (which was also part of the Ottoman Empire).

Community can be traced back to 4th century BCE

Jewish literature flourished, with Joseph Caro compiling the Shulchan Aruch and Shlomo ha-Levi Alkabes composing Lecha Dodi, the hymn used by Sephardim and Ashkenazim to welcome Shabbat.

In the 17th century, Shabbetai Zevi, a native of Smyrna, arose as a false messiah. He and his followers later adopted Islam rather than face death.

With the defeat of the Ottomans in World War I came the creation of the modern Turkish republic. Ataturk was elected president, the caliphate was abolished and a secular constitution adopted.

The 1923 Treaty of Lausanne recognized the new Turkish state, which accorded minority rights to the principal non-Muslim religious minorities and permitted them to carry on with their own schools and social institutions. In 1926, showing their Turkish patriotism, the Jewish community renounced its minority status and opted for Turkish citizenship.

Turkey remained neutral during World War II and even earlier, Ataturk invited hundreds of Jewish professors to leave Germany and take up academic posts in Turkey. They played a key role in developing the modern Turkish university system.

During the Holocaust, several Turkish diplomats saved Jews from the Nazis by providing passage to Turkey.

Today, many Turkish Jews and their descendents can be found in Israel, Latin America, Seattle, New York, Miami and San Francisco. A few hundred settled in Montreal and Toronto.

Settlers anxious over future

"Why not?" says Herzl Meiri, a shopkeeper from Kfar Saba. Meiri is among the 34 per cent of Israelis who, according to the Dahaf poll, are not worried about the imminent pullout of the army.

"The Arabs of Kalkilya have an interest in keeping this border quiet," says Meiri. "There may be a few attempted terrorist attacks at first, but once Arafat consolidates his power, things will be quiet here. If not, we can always bring the army back."

Most Israelis are less sanguine.

"It's frightening," says Ofra Gabish Cohen, who grew up in Hagor, an agricultural community a few kilometres west of Kalkilya. The trauma of the 1967 war is still vivid in her mind.

"Our Arab neighbors were so sure they were going to win the war that they began dividing up our homes among themselves," she recalls.

Today Cohen is ready to rise above her fears. "We have to take the risk — and it is a risk. But I don't believe there is any alternative," says the 38-year-old mother.

Does Phase 2 of the Oslo accord mean a return to the pre-1967 borders? She responds to the question with a long sigh. "I remember the days when we would spend the weekend shopping at the marketplace in Kalkilya. But those days ended with the intifadah."

Cohen's father, Yehoshua Gabish, has deeper doubts. Hagor, where he has lived for the past 40 years, was founded by veterans of the Palmach, the pre-state military force to which Yitzhak Rabin belonged. But Gabish, a former Palmach fighter and longtime Labor party supporter, is worried about the government's peace policy.

"If we were talking about a return to the 1967 borders I wouldn't be so worried. But the Arabs want to turn the clock back to 1948," he says. "We need to reach some agreement, but it's too early to remove the Israeli army from West Bank towns."

"Mothers tell me they will be afraid to send their children to school," says Pinchas. "We want peace, but we're afraid."

The opposition, led by the Likud, tried to capitalize on these fears by holding what it had hoped would be a massive demonstration in Kfar Saba earlier this month.

Among the opposition's new recruits was David Levy, a father of three, who until half a year ago, defended the government's peace policy.

"Getting out of the Gaza Strip was the right thing to do," says the longtime Labor party supporter. "But now the government is about to move the border a kilometre away from my home," says the teacher from Rosh Ha'ayin, a town that lies next to the 1967 Green Line.

"What did we fight for?" asks Levy. "Just to give it all back? It makes a mockery of our hard-won battles."

But for every new recruit like Levy, there are dozens of other Israelis living near the Green Line who ignored the demonstration (conspicuous among them Yitzhak Wald, the Labor party mayor of Kfar Saba). Some, like Roseanne Ness, disagreed with the premise of the protest.

"I believe the [Israel Defence Force] should get out of the territories," she says. "I would rather have a small country with clear, secure borders than a large country with a hostile population." But, Ness adds, "the question is timing. It may be too early for the IDF to leave. And while I favor a withdrawal in principle, the technical arrangements have to be right."

While 54 per cent of Israelis oppose the withdrawal of the army from West Bank towns, only 25,000 — most of them religious — took to the streets of Kfar Saba to protest.

"A disappointing turnout from the organizers' point of view," says public opinion expert Prof. Ephraim Inbar. "The Israeli public is apathetic," maintains Inbar, director of Bar Ilan University's BESA Centre for Strategic Studies. "There won't be a public outcry unless the pullout is followed by terror attacks."

Jewish settlers have warned that if the IDF withdraws from the West Bank, they will form their own army to replace it.

But an overwhelming majority of Israelis — 66 per cent — reject this idea. Many, living along the delicate "seam" that divides Israel from the West Bank, are plagued with doubts about the next phase of the peace process. They are afraid of what may happen when the army pulls out of neighboring Arab towns. But their attitude is, as Pinchus puts it: "Wait and see."

Israeli citizenship sought for Jonathan Pollard

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service and CJN Staff

JERUSALEM — A bid to gain Israeli citizenship for convicted spy Jonathan Pollard — the latest twist in the effort to free him from a life sentence in a U.S. prison — is being denounced by some members of Pollard's family.

Esther Zeitz Pollard of Toronto, who married the jailed naval analyst in prison two years ago, believes Pollard's chances for a pardon by President Bill Clinton would improve if Israel granted him citizenship.

Zeitz Pollard met earlier this month with Israeli justice minister David Libai, and urged him to grant her husband citizenship.

Libai said the government will consider the request and pledged to continue pressing for Pollard's release.

But Pollard's sister, father and several longtime supporters vehemently disagree with the tactic.

"The issue now is not getting him [Israeli] citizenship; the issue is getting him out of prison," Carol Pollard told The Jerusalem Post last Sunday.

"Israeli citizenship will not be helpful to Jonathan at this time," said Seymour Reich, president of the American Zionist Movement and former chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations. "It will hurt him."

Zeitz Pollard rejected claims that Israeli citizenship would damage her husband's case, arguing that formal Israeli recognition could hasten an early release.

Pollard is entering his 10th year in jail for giving U.S. secrets to Israel. His parole hearing is scheduled for this fall.

Clinton criticizes Polish leader over anti-Semitic incident

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — In a letter to the World Jewish Congress (WJC), U.S. President Bill Clinton has berated Polish President Lech Walesa for taking too long to condemn anti-Semitism following offensive remarks made by a Polish priest.

"I find Father [Henryk] Jankowski's words to be vile and deplorable," Clinton wrote to Edgar Bronfman, WJC president. "I was disheartened by the length of time it took President Walesa to issue a reaction condemning anti-Semitism."

In a June sermon in Gdansk attended by Walesa, Jankowski urged his parishioners to "wake up" to "Jewish dangers, blamed the Jews for starting World War II and equated the Star of David with the swastika and the Communist hammer and sickle.

After a week of silence, public pressure both at home and abroad forced Walesa to issue a statement saying that "anti-Semitism [is] despicable" and that he would not tolerate it.

In his statement, Walesa reiterated his respect for Jews and distanced himself from Jankowski, his former Solidarity union ally. But he fell short of satisfying his critics by not condemning Jankowski directly.

Clinton's letter was a response to an appeal from Bronfman urging the president to speak out on the issue at a June 26 meeting with Walesa in San Francisco.

Clinton did raise the issue of anti-Semitism at the California meeting. In his July 5 letter to Bronfman, the president said, "I stressed that anti-Semitism has no place in the civilized community and that I looked to him [Walesa] to set an example."

Play dramatizes spirit of Anne Frank

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An unsentimental, yet touching production of The Diary of Anne Frank by a new small company, Tribal Productions, runs until July 30.

It is at the Annex Theatre, Bathurst Street, near Bloor (539-8755). Tickets are $12, or $10 for seniors and students.

The harsh realities of eight people hiding in a small space in Amsterdam for more than two years do not obliterate the sheer grit and beauty of spirit of Anne Frank (Allison White).

Her optimism and love of life, in the midst of nagging and whining by most of the adults around her, shine like a beacon in this play by Albert Hackett and Frances Goodrich. As the world knows to its sorrow, the hideout was discovered and only the father, Otto, survived. Anne died in Bergen-Belsen.

Under the capable direction of Eli Lukawitz, the actors reveal the bruises, both physical and emotional, that result from this close contact. Surprisingly, though, there is a fair amount of humor, arising in part from the sensitive performances of White and Andrew Woolner, the latter uncannily portraying a 16-year-old unloved adolescent who, like Anne, is trying to come to grips with society. As the father, Sam Rosenthal, is realistic in the role of the man who was unsuccessful in keeping the Nazis away.

The Annex Theatre is not air-conditioned, so pick a cool night.

Last-Minute Concessions Lead To Deal With EU

JERUSALEM — Last-minute compromises by Agriculture Minister Ya'acov Tsur and Industry and Trade Minister Micha Harish gave the European Union's Council of Ministers the green light to approve the draft free trade agreement with Israel last week.

Although Foreign Ministry Economics Department head Oded Eran called the agreement "historic," Harish said despite the accomplishments, the Foreign Ministry's handling of the negotiations led to

Job Search is a monthly column on job-searching techniques by job search consultant Lisa Galet. Readers can forward any questions to THE CJN.

Summertime and the living is easy — unless you're hunting for a job.

In the summer months, a job hunter wants to take advantage of free daytime hours to enjoy warm weather. Meanwhile, there is the constant nagging pressure of knowing you need to find a job. There is a way to connect the two and the results can be staggering.

Once your resume is up to date and you know what kind of work you want, tell everyone you know. Speak in a positive way, informing your listener what kind of work you do. Ask if the listener knows of any vacancies in your area of expertise or if the listener knows someone else who works in that field. Get a name and a phone number. Then call that new contact and introduce yourself.

Let's say Joe Cohen spoke to Rob Levinson who told him to contact Sam Jacobs. When Joe calls Sam, he should say something like: "Hi. This is Joe Cohen. Rob Levinson told me I could call you. I am an expert computer repair technician. I have over 10 years experience in the business. I specialize in repairing personal computers. I am hardworking and easy to get along with. Rob said you may have a vacancy or may know someone who has a vacancy for someone with my skills." Then Joe needs to listen for Sam's response.

Knowing who to talk to is not that difficult. For all we know, Rob could be Joe's dentist, librarian, lawyer or mechanic. All these people might have worthwhile information.

Other people to talk to include the accountant (yours or your parents'), the day care director, the pharmacist, the plumber, the teachers (yours or your kid's), fraternity/sorority members, people in the job search support group you attend, car pool members, the tailor, the vet, the doctors, people you send New Year's cards to, the photographer (knows lots of people), the rabbi, people from shul, your spouse and your siblings.

Make a list of all these people and carry the list with you wherever you go. Add to your list as you can.

This is your expanded job search networking list. This is one of the most valuable tools a job hunter can have. It should take you about two hours to come up with the original list of everyone you know and locate phone numbers for each of the names on the list.

It could take weeks to actually speak to all these people. Keep track of whom you speak to and when. Make sure to call back and thank someone who has given you a lead that results in anything you consider to be positive.

You may want to create a business card with your name and phone number and a short explanation of your area of expertise. This card can be used in addition to your resume, which you will hand out when asked or when you are applying for a job.

This method of job hunting can also be used by those who are currently employed but unhappy in their jobs. Be careful, though. Once word gets around, your current position could be in jeopardy.

Book reveals paradox of A.M. Klein

By MICHAEL GREENSTEIN
Special to The CJN

The title of Prof. Zailig Pollock's book, A. M. Klein: The Story of the Poet, would lead the reader to believe that this is a biography.

Instead, Pollock offers us an analysis of much of Klein's poetry and prose, in support of an intricate thesis.

Chair of the English Department at Trent University and chair of the A. M. Klein Research and Publication Committee, Pollock has devoted a decade to the study of Klein's work.

He peppers his text with epigraphs from Gershom Scholem, Rainer Maria Rilke, Martin Gardner and Walter Benjamin to give a broader context for his argument about the interchangeability of insides and outsides, an inner and outer thematics prevalent in the key works of Klein.

According to Pollock, Klein retells the story of the poet throughout his career as an unfolding of the One in the Many. With poem after poem, Pollock pursues this theme which Klein himself had earlier pursued. The critic echoes the creative writer who struggled between countervailing centrifugal and centripetal forces of flight and return in relationship to the Jewish community.

If Klein wanted to serve as a spokesperson for his community, Pollock says, he became increasingly disillusioned with a Canadian-Jewish public that failed to appreciate him. Ultimately the spokesperson became silent and Pollock traces the sounds of silence from the early poetry of the '20s to the late prose works of the '50s.

Klein's position on modernism complicated matters, Pollock says. Although Klein's diction was largely archaic, he welcomed modernist writers such as Franz Kafka and James Joyce. But he rejected the modernists' sense of alienation and sought to ground his work in commitment to community, to the political and historical events before, during and after World War II.

Pollock suggests that Klein's affinity lay with postmodernism rather than with modernism, saying Klein's scepticism about absolutes places him closer to contemporary esthetics than to earlier brands of modernism.

In his analysis and evaluation of Klein's poetry, Pollock points out limitations and weaknesses. Klein, Pollock says, is rarely able to create characters who interact with one another in a convincingly realized social world.

Analyzing Klein's use of metaphor, Pollock concludes that the paradox of the writer remains that for one who wanted to be spokesperson for a community, the poet fashioned a language that seemed foreign to many of his fellows.

several missed opportunities.

Nevertheless, Harish was particularly proud that his insistence on Israel's sitting as a non-voting member in the committees which decide on EU-wide research and development projects was ultimately accepted by the reluctant Europeans.

For its part, Israel agreed to limit its citrus exports from 300,000 tons annually to 200,000 tons. In return, the Europeans agreed to expand the quotas on peeled fruits from 16,000 tons a year to 35,000 tons. They also agreed to initially allow Israel to export 14,000 tons of frozen sweet corn a year, raising the quota by an additional 1,000 tons a year, until exports reach 16,000 tons.

Japanese Plan To Establish Omer Industrial Project

JERUSALEM — Japanese entrepreneurs plan to establish an industrial complex — including hi-tech industries, research and development institutes and a tourism project — at the Omer industrial zone, near Beersheba.

Some $250 million (US) will be invested in the complex, not including the cost of the factories.

The tourism complex will be adjacent to the factories and be built at a cost of $100 million. It will include a 300-room hotel designed and run in Japanese style. The entire project will be built by the Rekoto Kasai company.

Motorola Sells Computer Terminals To NYPD

JERUSALEM — The New York Police Department (NYPD) has purchased $20 million (US) in computerized data terminals from Motorola Communications Israel.

The terminals will be installed in police cars and enable real-time data transfer on suspicious vehicles and people.

Chutzpah Is Coming: Did you ever notice how many words there are in the Yiddish language to describe persons who are nerds? There's your basic klutz, a clumsy person. There is a meshuganer, a crazy person. A nebesh is a nothing or a nerd, while a nudnik is a bore or pest. A pisher, meanwhile, describes a little squirt, while a shlemazel is a person with very bad luck, as Woody Allen sometimes presents himself to be. Call someone a shmegege and you're calling that person a jerk; yold refers to a chump, kvetch to a whiner.

These words come courtesy of the Verhtehrbook, or one-page dictionary that the Limelight Dinner Theatre in Toronto printed for its upcoming production of Chutzpah a Go-Go, a "newish Jewish musical comedy" involving the talents of Penny Di Marco, Bernadette Taylor, a four-piece klezmer band, and director Jordan Merkur. A previous production of this original Canadian musical several years ago enjoyed held-over engagements in Toronto and Winnipeg as well as a "showcase" in New York.

Telling the tales of four performers on the road, Chutzpah a Go-Go is full of songs, stories and shmaltz about growing up Jewish and experiencing Yiddish culture while living in Bubkes, Sask., population 107. Previews begin August 10, with the opening scheduled for August 17. Tickets are $20 to $46. Limelight Dinner Theatre, 2026 Yonge St., Toronto. 416-482-5200.

Divine Grace: Bette Midler's new album, Bette of Roses, is her first album of new material in five years and her 16th album in a recording career that began more than two decades ago. At 49, Midler seems to be taking a break from her hectic movie-making activities of the 1980s, when she acted in a string of cinematic hits, including Down and Out in Beverly Hills and the vastly successful Beaches of 1988.

After the flop of the big-budget 1991 film For The Boys in which she starred, Midler has returned to her singing career. She has also returned, along with her husband and daughter, to New York after living in Los Angeles since 1976.

"I moved back because of the earthquake," she recently told the New York Times. "And I needed to get back to a town where I could have a conversation about something other than grosses."

Midler starred in a TV adaptation of Gypsy that won favorable reviews two years ago, and may soon be involved in made-for-TV revivals of Jerry Herman's 1966 musical Mame. Noting the high number of gay friends who have died from the AIDS virus, Midler says she finds solace in doing good deeds. Recently she sponsored the Manhattan Restoration Project to help clean up dirty and derelict streets and parks.

Travel Talk

A Jewish genealogy conference that attracted about 650 delegates for five days in late June has demonstrated that interest in the once-neglected subject of Jewish roots is expanding throughout the Jewish world, even as new sources of information about pre-Holocaust European and Soviet Jews continue to emerge.

About a dozen Canadians joined hundreds of Americans and delegates from as far as Brazil, Israel, Lithuania, New Zealand, Poland and Russia at the 14th summer seminar in Jewish genealogy, perhaps the largest such gathering to date.

As in past years, speakers described little-known sources — for example, 19th-century military records from Ukraine and Belarus, an 1824 census of Romanian Jews and a collection of one million pre-1905 police records held in Moscow, most focusing upon the czar's troublesome Jewish subjects.

The first Jewish genealogical society of the postwar era was established in New York City in 1977. Today there are some 58 Jewish societies worldwide, including groups in Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa, Winnipeg and Vancouver. Their numbers are swelled by thousands of Jews in both the Diaspora and Israel who feel duty-bound to research and document family trees and Old World connections that were obliterated by the Holocaust.

The possibilities of Jewish genealogy are significantly enhanced by the increased willingness of former Soviet archives, previously under tight state control, to capitalize on their resources in dealings with the West. Still, RAGAS, the Russian-American Genealogical Archival Service that was established several years ago, has had only mixed success in obtaining documents from post-Soviet archives.

"Some [archivists] are very helpful, but others have decided that these are rich Americans and we can set our price depending on what they can pay," said Patricia Eames, a RAGAS official.

New Jersey-based genealogist Miriam Weiner, who has researched the family trees of Jewish clients in 20 archives in three former Soviet republics, journeys from the New World to the Old World so often that she maintains residences in both.

"The sudden access to this material and the possibility of travel to these countries has opened the eyes of people who never dreamed of visiting these places or seeing these documents," she said. "It has put to bed the myth that these documents were all destroyed and these towns were all wiped off the map. Certainly there was vast destruction, but we're finding many collections of documents that survived."

Jungle of post-Soviet regime

To be sure, many difficulties await visitors to post-Soviet archives, which may lack adequate finding aids as well as internal washroom facilities. At one archives, Weiner found some books "had been treated with a chemical to kill little bugs, one that is nauseating and causes a rash to develop on your hands." Nonetheless, few other North Americans have hacked their way into the jungle of the post-Soviet regime — Moldova, Ukraine, Belarus — and emerged with 19th-century Jewish records in hand.

When not attending lectures, conference delegates flocked to Birds of A Feather discussion groups on topics like Sephardi Research, Translating Yizkor Books, Enhancing Old Photographs, and Jewish Gen, the online electric network. Many also browsed the conference's resource room, where vendors sold books and computer programs, and a bulletin board displayed unique messages: "Nasielskers! (Nasielsk, Poland) Meet tonight, registration table, 10 p.m." or "Seeking Liphshitz from Zabludav."

Outside the hotel, delegates could be found perusing microfilm readers at the National Archives, the Library of Congress and the U.S. Holocaust Museum and Research Institute; others met with new-found cousins locally and visited Jewish cemeteries in nearby states. Some even behaved like regular tourists and took city tours or visited the White House.

New Jersey-based author Gary Mokotoff, who recently retired as president of the Association of Jewish Genealogical Societies (AJGS), says that interest in Jewish genealogy has increased tremendously since the first conference (New York, 1982) attracted only 150 people.

"As time passes, more and more Jews remember the family stories they heard from the Old Country, and want to know more about their family heritage. Researching their family trees is a way for them to connect with their Jewishness," Mokotoff says.

Future summer seminars in Jewish genealogy are planned for Boston, Paris, New York, Los Angeles and Salt Lake City for 1996 through 2000, respectively. For information, contact AJGS, P.O. Box 900, Teaneck, N.J. 07666.

Shoah survivors tribute

TORONTO — A tribute to the resilience of the 250,000 survivors of the Holocaust and to the Allied forces who liberated them is contained in four showcases of memorabilia on the fourth floor of the Lipa Green building.

The exhibit, running next to the Holocaust Memorial Museum until next March, can be viewed whenever the building is open.

Among its notable items are leaflets and documents showing how quickly survivors picked up the pieces of their lives and organized Yiddish arts events and newspapers in the displaced persons camps.

"Within a short time they were demonstrating against the British mandate in Palestine, despite their own problems," said museum director Pnina Zilberman.

The exhibit, which covers the years 1945 to 1948, contains items obtained from Canadian war veterans and Holocaust survivors and their children.

The exhibit concludes the special commemorations of the 50th anniversary of the liberation cosponsored by the Holocaust Remembrance Committee and the Ontario region, Canadian Jewish Congress.
